Naturalism Against Nature: Kinship and Degeneracy in Fin-de-siècle Portugal and Brazil

David James Bailey
Trinity Hall
1/9/17

This dissertation is submitted for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy
DECLARATION

This dissertation is the result of my own work and includes nothing which is the outcome of work done in collaboration except as declared in the Preface and specified in the text.

It is not substantially the same as any that I have submitted, or, is being concurrently submitted for a degree or diploma or other qualification at the University of Cambridge or any other University or similar institution except as declared in the Preface and specified in the text. I further state that no substantial part of my dissertation has already been submitted, or, is being concurrently submitted for any such degree, diploma or other qualification at the University of Cambridge or any other University or similar institution except as declared in the Preface and specified in the text.

It does not exceed the prescribed word limit.
Abstract

The present thesis analyses the work of four Lusophone Naturalist writers, two from Portugal (Abel Botelho and Eça de Queirós) and two from Brazil (Aluíso Azevedo and Adolfo Caminha) to argue that the pseudoscientific discourses of Naturalism, positivism and degeneration theory were adapted on the periphery of the Western world to critique the socio-economic order that produced that periphery. A central claim is that the authors in question disrupt the structure of the patriarchal family — characterised by exogamy and normative heterosexuality — to foster alternative notions of kinship that problematise the hegemonic mode of transmitting name, capital, bloodline and authority from father to son. It was this rapidly globalising form of patriarchal capitalism that saw Portugal and Brazil slip into positions of economic disadvantage and dependency, events that were then naturalised in centres of dominance as incidences of national, racial and sexual “degeneracy”. The thesis thus draws links between contemporaneous disquiet about the nation’s race and bloodline; the various “homosexual scandals” that rocked the period; the considerable prevalence of incest and non-normative desire in the literature concerned, and the supposed “inconsistencies” in the style of Lusophone Naturalism that have often been regarded as imperfections in the face of Zola’s model. I propose instead that such adaptations to the Naturalist model can be read as attempts to reassess its potentially marginalising discourse from the margins themselves, exposing something “queer” at the textual, discursive level. This is the process that I call writing “against nature”, relating non-normative kinship to the disruption of the Naturalist aesthetic more generally. Drawing on postcolonial theory, psychoanalysis and queer theory, I argue that the Lusophone Naturalist perspective presents the divided world of the period as anything but a “natural” state of affairs. In this sense, a second line of reasoning is developed: that its authors formed a tentative transatlantic movement that criticised Naturalism as conceived in centres of dominance, calling for a revision of the role that the “scientists” played in shaping and understanding the fin-de-siècle world.
Acknowledgements

I would first like to thank my supervisors, Maria Manuel Lisboa (Manucha) and Brad Epps, without whose generous support and expertise this work would not have been possible. I am particularly grateful to Manucha who has taught me since my final year of undergraduate study, rescuing me from the clutches of linguistics after introducing me to O Primo Basílio. Her teaching, guidance and friendship have been second to none. Prof Epps, meanwhile, has considerably influenced and refined my work as a graduate student, including the present thesis, encouraging me to read Naturalist literature from Brazil and introducing me to queer theory with characteristic flair and enthusiasm. I have learned a great deal from both my supervisors and feel very privileged to have worked with such inspirational academics.

I am sincerely grateful to Trinity Hall, Cambridge, for its unwavering support over the past eight years. I have cherished the time I have spent here and the college has extended its generosity on countless occasions. I would like to thank Martin Ruehl in particular for his kindness and attention. I am also indebted to several other academics in Cambridge and elsewhere who have helped along the way: Vivien Kogut Lessa de Sá, who amongst other things suggested I read O Mulato; Sérgio Nazar, who kindly helped to orientate me in Rio de Janeiro; and Leonardo Mendes and Helena Buescu, both of whom lent their time and provided illuminative suggestions for research. I would also like to thank the Biblioteca Nacional de Portugal and Biblioteca Nacional do Brasil for granting me access to their archives.

As ever, I owe much to my friends in the UK and Lisbon who have supported me in numerous ways, and particularly to those in Cambridge who have entertained my enthusiasm for Portuguese culture, even reading, to my manifest delight, the novels of Eça de Queirós. I am also deeply grateful to my family for their unshakable love and support over the years.

Finally, I would like to thank the Wolfson Foundation, who generously funded this research, including several formative trips to Portugal and Brazil.
Contents

Introduction 6
Nature, culture, and Naturalism: an age-old problem 6
Portugal and Brazil at the fin de siècle: Naturalism on the margins 14
Que diabo de trapalhada de parentesco é esta? Portugal and Brazil: an uneasy kinship 18

Chapter I: Abel Botelho 28
Introduction 28
O Barão de Lavos and the pathological novel 30
Freedom in madness? The limits of literary pathology 33
O Barão de Lavos and social context: whose pathology? 36
Para fora do sórdido armário: opening the urban closet 47
Allegories against nature: Dom Sebastião, kinship trouble and the end of empire 55
Conclusions 57

Chapter II: Eça de Queirós 60
Introduction 60
A cidade e as serras: queering Oedipus 66
Amigos coloridos 70
Oedipal trouble in O primo Basílio and O crime do Padre Amaro 77
Dom Sebastião’s “mistake” revisited 79
Desire, kinship and exchange value: a discussion of (homo)erotic triangles 83
Penso eu e pensa meu cunhado Crispim: slaying God, man and the canon in A relíquia 90

Chapter III: Aluísio Azevedo 102
Introduction: um naturalismo nos trópicos 102
Oedipus in Brasil: Aluísio Azevedo’s O Mulato 113
Race, incest and Bumba-meu-boi: rethinking the Oedipal model 119
Conclusions on O Mulato: narrative dialectics and the triumph of Maranhão 126
The dis-solution of the family: kinship and allegory in Casa de Pensão 131
Concluding remarks: Azevedo and the canon 142

Chapter IV: Adolfo Caminha 146
Introduction 146
The creolisation of degenerescence 152
Bom Crioulo as (anti-)foundational novel 157
The dialogue with O Barão de Lavos 159

Concluding remarks 168

Bibliography 174
Introduction

Nature, culture and Naturalism: an age-old problem

Across a range of disciplines in recent years, growing recognition has emerged of a new epoch in Earth’s history. The Anthropocene, as this “age of man” has been termed, designates the period in which humans have been the dominant influence on the climate and environment, and thus reflects a significant shift in the natural and social sciences, collapsing any binary distinction between humanity’s collective activities, or “culture”, and the fate of our “natural” surroundings. While the effects of human activity on the planet are now impossible to pass over, the distinction has structured western thought for centuries, its symptoms eminently visible in the contemporary world. Mountains of human waste, for example, lie hidden from general view; the social mechanisms that appear to make such waste simply “disappear” are complex and numerous. As Slavoj Žižek puts it, “to guarantee the symbolic consistency of our “sphere” of life […] something — some excremental waste — has to disappear”. By disavowing its impact on the environment in this manner, humanity has been able to position itself, symbolically of course, as an observer, consumer, protector, even destroyer of “nature”, but rarely as an integral, reciprocating part of its system, with increasingly perilous consequences.

---

1 See https://en.oxforddictionaries.com/definition/anthropocene (accessed 24/12/2016).

2 As Hamilton et. al. argue, the Anthropocene represents a “threshold marking a change in the relationship of humans to the natural world” since “we are no longer talking about the spread of human influence […] but of a shift in the total system.” See Hamilton, Gemenne and Bonneuil, The Anthropocene and the Global Environmental Crisis: Rethinking modernity in a new epoch (New York: Routledge, 2015), chapter 1, ¶ 7, Google ebook.

5 It is estimated that 140,000 species face extinction on Earth each year. See Pimm, Stuart L. et. al., "The Future of Biodiversity", Science, Vol. 269 (5222), pp 347–350.
The declaration of the Anthropocene surely disrupts the related notion of an intact, abundant “natural world” that civilisation has supposedly degraded and damaged, an Edenic paradise now forever lost in a modern-day reenactment of the original Fall. One recalls the bucolic fantasies of the Romantics who, writing and painting at the dawn of the industrial age, sought to recreate this “pristine” garden, threatened by the encroaching influence of the city. It is interesting that contemporaneous discourses of environmental “conservation” reproduce the notion of “nature” as operating in a fragile state of degeneracy, its presumed bountifulness at risk of withering and vanishing forever, a mindset that paradoxically reinstates a role for mankind as its custodian. In a similar vein, Carolyn Merchant argues that the Western propensity to conquer, settle, plant and cultivate the earth, most obviously in the presumed tabula rasa of the “New” World, plays out a desire to return to the mythical Garden of Eden by restoring a world of plenty to the altered landscape. Humanity conceives a conflicting function for itself, imagined on the one hand to be “destroying” the “natural world”, and on the other to be replenishing what has been lost through plantation and (re)production, invoking a procreative, generative, one might say heteronormative view of mankind to justify the logic of colonisation and cultivation characteristic of modern Western history. Consider, for example, the theorisation (and later justification) of the Portuguese empire as a so-called “Lusotropical” racial family, disseminating through the world and supposedly “improving” the “nature” of indigenous peoples through miscegenation and procreation. The present thesis is concerned with querying such “natural”, “degenerate” and heteronormative representations of kinship and the human in the (post)colonial world, assessing their role in disrupting the dynamics of power in the West with an analysis of Naturalist literature from Portugal and Brazil.

The assertively named “Naturalism” that developed in the latter years of the nineteenth century is particularly noteworthy for its problematic representation of “nature”. If Romanticism, to which the movement in many ways reacted, idealised the rural, the pastoral and the sentimental, the Naturalists focussed chiefly on the modern city, idealising supposedly objective, detailed narration with the aim of performing a “scientific” study of nature. Arising in France under Émile Zola, the movement spread with great popularity, controversy and scandal through the Western

---

6 I am reminded of the playful flutes at the opening of Beethoven’s Pastoral Symphony, or the wanderings of England’s Lakeland Poets.

8 First theorised by Brazilian sociologist Gilberto Freyre, and later adopted by the Estado Novo dictatorship as justification for the Portuguese overseas empire, Lusotropicalism held that a putative Portuguese adaptability to the tropics, and associated capacity for miscegenation, were defining factors in Brazilian growth and development, as though colonialism were a “racial and cultural gift”. See Hilary Owen, Mother Africa, Father Marx: Women’s Writing of Mozambique, 1948-2002 (Cranbury, NJ: Rosemont, 2007), pp. 18-20 (p.18). See also Gilberto Freyre, Integração portuguesa nos trópicos (Lisboa: Junta de Investigações do Ultramar, 1958).
world in its quest for universal, “scientific” truth; no one described its essence more succinctly than Zola himself in his famous preface to Thérèse Raquin, where he compares the process of literary composition to the work of a surgeon:

If the novel is read with care it will be seen that each chapter is the study of a curious physiological case. [...] I simply carried out on two living bodies the same analytical examination that surgeons perform on corpses. [...] I found myself in the same position as those artists who copy the nude body without feeling the least stirring of desire. [...] I was lost to the world, completely engrossed in my exact and meticulous copying of real life and the analysis of the human mechanism.9

Behind these statements lies a common assumption that there is an objective, universal truth accessible through careful, painstaking study — and, by the same token, that contemplating this “natural” reality necessitates the renunciation of subjective human experience. Seemingly in contrast to the Romantics, any appeal to the sentiments ought to be controlled and disavowed even as it surfaces as a possibility. In its self-proclaimed search for the detached observation of “nature”, Naturalism rehearsed the nature-culture problem at a particularly high pitch, so much so that cultural production was idealised as the negation of subjective, “cultural” influence.10

Naturalism thus formed part of a wider arc of epistemological approaches in the nineteenth century that drew on positivist principles of reason and logic as the only valid route to truth. Itself born of the Enlightenment, positivism, which was first formulated as a distinctive method by Auguste Comte, sought to apply scientific tenets of empirical observation, experiment and evaluation to all aspects of knowledge, in particular to society, discounting subjective impressions in the process.11 The Naturalists then applied this theory to art and literature, with narrators imagined as objective “scientists” studying calculable social and human forces.12 Rejecting the sentimental turn of the Romantics, they took as precedents the Realists, who similarly strove to portray society “objectively”; indeed, they perhaps differed from each other only by degree, with the Naturalists claiming greater allegiance to methods from the natural sciences, transforming a literary “tendency” into a “doctrine” and “way of seeing, of reflecting, of studying, of making experiments”.13

---

11 For one of the classic treatises of positivism, see Comte, Auguste, A General View of Positivism, translated from the French by J. H. Bridges (Cambridge: CUP, 2009). As Comte argues, “The primary object […] of Positivism is twofold: to generalise our scientific conceptions, and to systematise the art of social life” (p. 2).

12 See Furst and Skrine, p. 8.

13 This is the distinction drawn by Zola’s closest ally, Paul Alexis. See ibid., p. 8-9.
Zola's surgical analogy, suggestive of penetrative incision, evidently invokes this experimental thrust, promising to reveal the “truth”, and indeed the “secrets”, of human nature.

Since its inception, the movement has generated great controversy and been critiqued from a variety of angles. In the beginning, readers and critics were scandalised by writers’ willingness to confront issues traditionally considered taboo, or indeed “secrets”, in polite society, especially — and most spectacularly — the language and politics surrounding sex. More generally, the movement elicited accusations of immorality, since much of what was considered inappropriate for representation had now become a valid, or at least self-validating, object of study; as the French critic Hippolyte Taine, himself an inspiration for the Naturalists, famously argued, “vice and virtue are products like vitriol and sugar”, and were at least as lucrative as these when presented to an enthralled bourgeois readership in narrative form. The comparison of virtue to sugar is an interesting one as it exemplifies the problem identified by much of the criticism of the movement in more recent times: the transformation of what today are often termed “social constructions” into physical, or indeed physiological phenomena. Thus social prescriptions of gender could be depicted as inevitabilities of sex, and the historic subjugation of black people could be powerfully recoded as supposedly inherent racial inferiority. Once more, humanity’s role in constructing and shaping the surrounding world could be conveniently denied by assuming the position of mere observer of “nature”. Perhaps the most significant piece of criticism to emerge of the Realist-Naturalist ability to disguise the subjectivity of representation is Roland Barthes’ 1968 essay “The Reality Effect”. Here, Barthes identifies seemingly superfluous details in Flaubert’s Madame Bovary that are in fact significant precisely in their insignificance, insofar as they are “reputed to denote the real directly[,] all that they do — without saying so — is signify it”. Barthes’ formalist approach to the movement has no doubt influenced more recent criticism of the moment, often focused on the tendency to represent subjective impressions as “natural” phenomena. That is not to say, however, that the movement partook uniformly of this naturalising process, even in the case of Zola himself. One of the many apparent contradictions of Naturalism is that whilst it tended to 15 Cited by Furst and Skrine, p. 20.

16 Ibid., p. 31.
17 This the conclusion of David Brookshaw, for example, in relation to Naturalist literature in Brazil. See Brookshaw, David, Race and Colour in Brazilian Literature (London: The Scarecrow Press, 1986), pp. 37-53.
19 As Furst and Skrine argue, the tenets of Naturalism are “impossible”; Zola conceded later that “a work of art is a segment of nature seen through the eyes of a certain temperament”, thus admitting “a far greater degree of subjectivity than his theory strictly permits”. See Furst and Skrine, pp. 30-31.
naturalise geopolitical inequalities, it also dispersed with ease across nations and regions placed differently within the resulting hierarchies. How the Naturalists dealt with this contradiction in the relatively marginalised countries of Portugal and Brazil will be a central concern of this thesis, and one I will return to shortly.

The apparent necessity, or at least convenience, of representing culture as nature in the latter part of the nineteenth century, particularly in relation to race, gender and sex, coupled with the great financial success of Naturalist works, belies the wider social context in which Naturalism was implicated. With the industrial revolution and the emergence of a global capitalist system exported through empire and colonialism, the nineteenth century bore witness to great upheavals in demographics and social structures throughout the Western world. In Europe, the mechanisation of the means of production led to the rapid growth of the working classes and the cities in which they lived, alongside the bourgeoisie whose wealth they worked to create. Women were now increasingly incorporated into the means of production, no longer solely as mothers, and slowly acquired the structures to support and educate themselves, so much so that by the 1870s there was talk of unmarried, “surplus women” in Victorian England, alongside debate on how to deal with the “problem”, an implicit testimony to their increasing independence, if also continued stigmatisation. The aristocracy, meanwhile, slowly lost influence in the economy, sometimes precipitously so in the various republican and liberal revolutions that rocked the continent from 1789. At the same time, vast global empires and “underdeveloped”, newly independent states provided the produce for use in European industry, often made by slaves, until the practice was finally outlawed in Brazil in 1888, the last country in the Western hemisphere to do so. The incorporation of women and people of other nationalities and races into this newly globalised market brought great wealth to some, but with it a tendency, in many intellectual circles, to justify the social hierarchies on which they depended as natural phenomena. These relations of dependency and exploitation in the Western world are of considerable importance to this thesis, in 20 A particularly fine example comes from the second novel of Zola’s The Three Cities trilogy, Rome, where, commenting upon the apparent decadence of the city in relation to its industrial sister, Milan, the narrator remarks “[t]he centre of civilisation has been displaced”. Pierre, the protagonist, then seeks a racial explanation for this “displacement”, asking himself “if the soil were not exhausted […] if it were not for ever drained of the sap which makes a race healthy, a nation powerful.” See Émilie Zola, Rome, translated by Ernest Alfred Vizetellit (London: Macmillan, 1901), p. 55 (my italics). There are other attempts to find a physical explanation for Rome’s “decline”, including “that other cause of mortal languishment, the Campagna — the desert of death which the dead river crossed and which girdled Rome with sterility” (p. 54, my italics).

---

21 See, for example, Heike Bauer, “Measurements of Civilisation”, in Sexuality at the fin-de-siècle, edited by Cryle and Forth (Cranbury, NJ: Rosemont, 2008), pp 93-108, for a discussion of the ways in which contemporaneous, pseudoscientific discourses sought to hierarchise different nations and civilisations.

that they inform the overarching claim that Naturalism was adapted and disrupted on the margins of that world in such a way that critiqued the production of those very margins.

Before I move on to Portugal and Brazil in more detail, however, further comment is warranted on the widespread preoccupation, at the time, with sex, gender, race and above all the body, onto which the patriarchal ideology of the age was inscribed. As Elaine Showalter has demonstrated, the fin de siècle in particular, as the upheavals of the century gathered pace, was characterised by a generalised perception of cultural and national “decline” that manifested as “sexual anarchy”, with a series of sexual scandals, panic about the spread of syphilis, hysteria and national-racial “degeneration”, surely preempting concerns surrounding the degradation of a supposed virginal, fecund “natural” world articulated a century later.

As I will explore further in the first chapter, the concept of degeneracy was extensively theorised and formalised in the fin de siècle, establishing hierarchies of race, gender, sexuality and nationality based on the application of Darwin’s groundbreaking theory of evolution to society. Thus different social groups, at different stages of evolution, would supposedly compete, like animal species, for survival. Ideas of “natural” and “unnatural” bodies flourished; this was the age of freak shows, of circuses and colonial exhibits, in which supposedly “abnormal” bodies could be presented for observation, spectacle and control. One of the most significant pieces of scholarly work to emerge in this line of enquiry is of course Michel Foucault’s A History of Sexuality, which traces the origins of the concept of sexuality and its historically “deviant” protagonist par excellence, the homosexual. As Foucault demonstrates, the term “homosexuality” was first coined in 1879, and the concept of homosexual as a particular social “type” was gradually consolidated over the course of the 24 For an analysis of the various kinds of “freak” bodies in the fin de siècle and their ideological underpinnings, see Elizabeth Stephens, “Anatomies of Desire” in Cryle and Forth, pp 25-38.

---

25 Ibid.

26 Showalter draws specific comparisons between the fin de siècle and the AIDS crisis of the 1980s rather than the environmental crisis I referred to at the beginning; however, since both invoke notions of decadence and decay from an idealised “natural” and heteronormative, reproductive state, ultimately entailing apocalypse, there are resonances of the fin-de-siècle experience in today’s debates surrounding natural and cultural “decline”.

27 Herbert Spencer was one of the first figures to apply Darwin’s theory of evolution to society, leaving a considerable legacy on other pseudoscientific disciplines. The sexologist Krafft-Ebing, for example, believed that societies could be hierarchised according to their degree of evolutionary progress, and argued that how they approached sexual relations was a privileged marker for establishing such hierarchies. See Bauer, p. 97.

nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, often with recourse to physiology, becoming a privileged site around which the bourgeoisie created systems of knowledge, power and control. A “will to know” — reminiscent of Zola’s surgical examination, perhaps — promised to reveal the “secrets” of sexuality, a quest that invoked other markers of supposed deviance and degeneracy. By the fin de siècle, sexologists in France and Germany began to categorise different kinds of homosexual, ranging from the petit-jésus, an adolescent young man introduced to prostitution, to the entreteneurs, “hardened” pederasts for whom the dangers of the pursuit were part of its appeal. As Stephens argues, “categories [of deviance] never managed to contain adequately the content they purported to describe”, resulting in an exponential number of deviant bodies that were paradoxically required to sustain the notion of a “normal” and “natural” human being. Unsurprisingly, it was the bourgeoisie, the class that benefitted most from the changes of the past century, that had the most to gain from the proliferation of discourses used to identify and isolate every entity that did not conform to its ideology. Thus the delinquent, the mad, the hysterical, the darker-skinned, the promiscuous and the licentious were cast as naturally different and inferior, atavistic forms of homo sapiens, in an attempt to justify the precarious social privilege of the dominant class — a fraught task, of course, given that the threat of “contagion”, through disease, miscegenation or the conditioning effects of nurture, loomed large. As we shall see in the first chapter with the case of O Barão de Lavos, Naturalist literature often participated in the fin-de-siècle frenzy surrounding the “deviant” body, reflecting but also criticising, at times, the socioeconomic and geopolitical context that rendered the naturalisation of sexual, racial and national hierarchies particularly convenient.

Although I will return often to degeneration theory and positivist approaches to race, sex and nationality, I would like to introduce an example here that demonstrates the peculiar relevance of fin-de-siècle pseudoscience to Portugal and Brazil, and indeed to southern nations distanced

---

32 Stephens, p. 37.

33 In the early 1880s, the syphilis “crisis” led to talk of “venereal peril” and the “syphilisation” of the western world. See Showlater, p. 189. Meanwhile, homosexuality was itself theorised as a “disease” and moral “sickness” that threatened to topple the western world as it supposedly had with Greece and Rome (p. 4).

34 Many theorists distinguished between born “deviants” (such as criminals and homosexuals) and those who turned to “vice” through environmental factors. See, for example, Cesare Lombroso, Criminal Man [1876], translated and with introduction by Mary Gibson and Nicole Hahn Rafter (London: Duke University Press, 2006).
from centres of dominance more generally. This is the theory of the “Sotadic Zone” developed in 1886 by Sir Richard Burton, translator of Arabian Nights and publisher of the Kama Sutra in English. According to Burton, the Sotadic Zone is an area of androgyny, pederasty and generalised perversion lying in the hotter regions to the south of the Alps and the Pyrenees, encompassing Greece, Italy, North Africa, the Iberian Peninsula, much of Asia, and all of the Americas. “Within the Sotadic Zone”, writes Burton, “the Vice is popular and endemic, held at the worst to be a mere peccadillo, whilst the races to the North and South of the limits here defined practise it only sporadically amid the opprobrium of their fellows who […] look upon it with the liveliest disgust”. In the first instance, Burton’s claim is interesting because it demonstrates the ease with which contemporaneous categories of deviance slipped seamlessly into one another, creating a geographical area around which “aberrances” of sex, gender, race and nationality were dangerously clustered, aggravated by a hot climate. Just as the categories could not contain the content they supposedly described, so did they blur into one another in mutually empowering ways. Adducing various modes of “degeneracy”, the hypothesis of the Sotadic Zone emerges as one of the most lucid attempts to naturalise geopolitical and socioeconomic disparities across the globe, since Burton’s vast region encompasses both the (post-)colonial nations on which Northern European dominance depended, and the southern European nations whose relative “underdevelopment” served to confirm their perceived cultural inferiority.

Whilst the tension between nature and culture remains far from resolved, at the fin de siècle, a century of profound social changes had the effect of raising the tension to fever pitch, with concerted and systematic attempts to ground social and cultural phenomena — race, sex and gender, even wealth and poverty — in strictly physical terms. The nineteenth century did, after all, witness the rise of industrial society and humanity’s assumed position as master of, rather than participant within, “nature”, though at the fin de siècle, often it was entire peoples and races that were conceived as controllable elements of the “natural” world, even if they were considered somehow “unnatural” in the process. The positing of the “deviant” Sotadic Zone exemplifies the power of “science” at the time, which could all too easily be brought into the service of socioeconomic hierarchies. It is curious, in this respect, that positivist-inspired discourses travelled around the world at the time with such impact, including to countries that were explicitly marginalised by the theories. In one sense, it testifies to the influence that they wielded at the time. But it is a contradiction that warrants investigation, and indeed already has, particularly in Brazil, where critics of the Naturalist movement have long been receptive to its propensity to denigrate its people. Burton’s sweeping claim about the supposed degeneracy of the South could even, perhaps, be considered an invitation to visit the Sotadic Zone and its (presumably perverted) “scientists” in more detail. This thesis, then, is dedicated to the Naturalists of Portugal and Brazil and their attempts to reproduce, whilst also adapt and subvert, the pseudoscientific discourses that troubled their respective countries. As we shall see, these were writers that, in different measure, wrote against naturalising representations of the human that gained special currency at the fin de siècle.

Portugal and Brazil at the fin de siècle: Naturalism on the margins

Though formerly coloniser and colonised, by the end of the nineteenth century, and as the theorisation of the Sotadic Zone perhaps implies, Portugal and Brazil both found themselves at the margins of the great powers of Northern Europe. Brazil, newly independent in 1822, retained the practice of slavery for decades to come, with a predominantly agricultural economy that supplied raw materials such as rubber, coffee and cotton to industrial centres in Europe, although from the 1870s, its cities began to expand and modernise. Portugal, too, continued to exercise considerable influence on its former colony, where it maintained a visibly exploitative, if diminished presence through immigration and, often, control of land and property, despite many immigrants being themselves poor. Brazil’s sense of economic and cultural marginality was so great that in 1893, writer and artist Raúl Pompeia, who described Portugal as “o pérfido Caím”, published a caricature entitled “O Brasil crucificado entre dois ladrões”, depicting a Brazilian being sacrificed next to an obese, greedy Portuguese man and an English merchant. Meanwhile, despite its regional dominance, Portugal’s imperial heyday had long since passed. A series of colonial losses over previous centuries famously came to a head in the British Ultimatum of 1890, ordering the Portuguese to withdraw from central African areas staked out in the notorious “Rose-coloured” Map of 1885, presented at the Berlin Treaty to lay claim to a coast-to-coast colony in southern Africa. The national humiliation was considerable, generating extensive criticism of the ailing monarchy in 36 Perhaps most notable in this respect is António Cândido’s now-classic essay, “De Cortiço a Cortiço”, in Novos Estudos, CEBRAP, No. 30 (July 1991), pp. 111-29, which examines the adaptations to Zola’s model in Aluísio Azevedo’s O Cortiço. I will return to this essay shortly.

---

39 Ibid., p. 127.
events that have in retrospect been seen as instrumental in its eventual downfall in 1910. Relatively poor and with little industry, Portugal depended extensively on finance, and indeed military support, from Northern Europe, particularly from Britain; it thus found itself both influential within its dwindling colonial world and dependent on the centres of global capitalism. This is the conclusion of Boaventura de Sousa Santos in his much-cited essay “Entre Próspero e Caliban”, in which he argues that Portuguese national identity in the nineteenth century was characterised by the experience of both marginality and centrality at once. As Eça de Queirós, whose work I will consider in this thesis, himself pointed out, the Portuguese at the time both racially derided Brazilians as macacos, and zealously adopted the latest cultural trends from France, tendencies that illustrate rather neatly where all three countries stood within the balance of power in the nineteenth-century world.

No doubt as a consequence, the positivist discourses of the fin de siècle were received with a degree of panic in Portugal and Brazil, where wider concerns about national and cultural decline appeared to resonate with the circumstances of the historical moment. In Portugal, the first group of intellectuals to adopt the principles of positivism, the Geração de ’70, contemplated no less than the end of the Portuguese nation. Oliveira Martins, for example, argued that the Portuguese were at risk of extinction in competition with “superior” races, citing their supposed “amor da ociosidade”, “desordem dos costumes”, and entrenched syphilis, in a distinctly pathological tone. Another, Antero de Quental, sought to identify the causes of a supposed Iberian decadência, a period of cultural decay with its roots in Catholicism and the original colonial project. In the first chapter on O Barão de Lavos, I discuss in more detail how contemporaneous concerns about cultural “degeneration” could be made complicit with Portuguese history to create a pointedly negative portrayal of the nation. The relatively popular, non-canonical position of Lavos,

---

40 See, for example, Miguel Sánches de Baêna, Diário de D. Manuel: e estudo sobre o regicídio (Lisboa: Publicações Alfa, 1990), pp. 55.

46 Quental, Antero de, “Causas da decadência dos povos peninsulares nos últimos três séculos” (lecture delivered at the Casino de Lisboa, 22nd March 1871, available at http://www.arqnet.pt/portal/discursos/maio01.html [accessed 05/05/17]).
meanwhile, suggests how the pessimistic reception of positivist discourse was by no means restricted to the intellectual elite; on the contrary, it reached a growing, if relatively small bourgeois readership, diffusing through society. The fin de siècle was also, in Portugal, when the language of degeneracy and pathology entered the realm of journalism, testifying to the increasing “scientifisation” of everyday life. Three homosexual scandals in particular caused great excitement and scandal in the national press. In August 1881, the Marquês de Valada was caught in flagrante delictum with a soldier on the Travessa da Espera in Bairro Alto, Lisbon, prompting widespread ridicule and a number of compromising caricatures. Meanwhile in 1886, two boys, presumed missing, were found on the Rua do Trombeta, where they had been providing sexual services to a wealthy businessman. Most significantly of all, perhaps, was the Marinho da Cruz case of April 1886, involving the murder of a military cadet by his male lover, this being one of the first instances of contemporaneous psychiatry applied to the Portuguese legal system, with newspapers decrying the murder as the “síntoma funesto” of a “carácter irregular”. These examples underline the parallels between Portugal’s experience of the fin de siècle and, for example, that of Victorian England with widespread sexual panic and efforts to isolate “deviant” aspects of society. However, as the historical works of Oliveira Martins testify, positivists in Portugal often saw the nation’s loss of global influence as a symptom of some peculiarly national “decadence” and decline.

If Portuguese intellectuals found the implications of degeneration theory compelling, though difficult to stomach on a national scale, Brazil’s experience of the fin de siècle witnessed still greater anxiety surrounding the “viability” of the nation, so much so that the country oversaw a wave of racial-social engineering that in many ways anticipated the eugenics movement in twentieth-century Europe. Concurrent with the Geração de ’70 in Portugal came the Escola do Recife, a group of positivist intellectuals encompassing figures such as Tobias Barreto, Araripe Júnior and Sílvio Romero. The latter, whom I consider in more detail in chapters three and four, used the theories of Jean-Baptiste Lamarck and Herbert Spencer to tackle Brazil’s perceived racial “inferiority”, the troublesome legacy of slavery. On a visit to Brazil at the turn of the century, for example, British racist James Bryce lamented what he described as the country’s “plight”: a huge

---

48 Ibid., p. 29.

49 Ibid., p. 32.

50 Diário Popular, 24th and 26th April 1886, Biblioteca Nacional de Portugal.

51 Victorian England is the main focus for Showalter’s study.
black and mestizo population. To combat the “problem” posed by the implications of the European theories, Romero advocated miscegenation to “whiten”, over time, the Brazilian population, an argument that paved the way for the política de branqueamento between 1880 and 1920, when immigration rights to Brazil were heavily skewed towards white Europeans. Positivist approaches to race and society thus spurred elaborate plans, by the white ruling elite, for national “survival” in a present that seemed too dark(-skinned) to contemplate. So too did analogous approaches to sexuality lead to efforts, as in Portugal, at controlling and policing “deviant” sections of the population in ways that trickled through the social strata. In 1894, Francisco Viveiros de Castro published Atentados ao pudor: estudos sobre as aberrações do instinto sexual, an attempt to pathologise sexuality that Green describes as a “pot pourri” of homophobic European theories. A proliferation of new, popular terms emerged to describe homosexuals, such as bicha, fresco, puto, fanchono and viado, while the main cruising ground of Rio de Janeiro in the nineteenth century, the Largo do Rossio (now Praça Tiradentes) became so notorious that in the 1870s it was closed at midnight to deter what were seen as dangerous liaisons. The positivist turn in nineteenth-century Brazil thus saw large sections of society targeted for the “betterment” of the nation, often explicitly and systematically.

Given the evident overlap in the experience of the fin de siècle in Portugal and Brazil, whose economic marginality was variously racialised and naturalised, there is considerable merit in studying their cultural output from the period in tandem, an endeavour that has been undertaken in relation to Eça de Queirós and Machado de Assis, for example, but not in the case of the Naturalist movement specifically, despite several book-length studies of Naturalism in Brazil. There has been comparative work undertaken with Abel Botelho and Adolfo Caminha, and

---

55 See James N. Green, Beyond Carnival: Male Homosexuality in Twentieth-Century Brazil (Chicago: Chicago UP, 1999), p. 27-34.

56 Ibid., p. 44.

57 Ibid., p. 25.

58 See, for example, Beatriz Berrini, Eça e Machado (São Paulo: FAPESP, 2005).

indeed Eça and Azevedo, but these studies do not look at the movement in a more global sense and, in the case of Montello at least, seek to elucidate the influence of one (European) author on the other Brazilian one. This thesis, then, besides its focus on kinship, to which I will return shortly, differs in two senses to these previous transatlantic studies. Firstly, it aims to analyse Naturalism in Portugal and Brazil as one, if uneven, Lusophone movement, characterised by its tentative resistance to positivist discourse as conceived in cultural centres of dominance. Botelho, Eça, Azevedo and Caminha are markedly diverse authors where their readerships, literary markets and relation to the canon are concerned, but all grappled with the precarious position of writing in an idiom that pathologised their nations of literary study. Secondly and in the process, it seeks to demonstrate the ways in which ideas circulated around the Atlantic in mutually productive ways, fostering an transnational critique of nineteenth-century pseudoscience in the Sotadic Zone.

Que diabo de trapalhada de parentesco é esta? Portugal and Brazil: an uneasy kinship

Whilst close linguistic, economic and cultural ties in the nineteenth century justify a comparative study of Portuguese and Brazilian Naturalism in their own right, the two countries were brought still closer together in the peculiar circumstances that saw both ruled by the same royal family, the House of Braganza, until 1889. As is widely known, the relocation of the Portuguese court from Lisbon to Rio de Janeiro in 1808, following the Napoleonic invasion of Portugal in the same year, had the unanticipated consequence of stoking the flames of independence in Brazil, a goal achieved in 1822 when Prince Pedro, made Regent of Brazil when the royal court returned to Lisbon, announced his allegiance to the independence cause, declaring himself Emperor. Less well known, perhaps, is that his father Dom João VI, seeing that independence was inevitable, reportedly advised his son to lead the movement so that Brazil might at least be ruled by one and the same family: “se o Brasil se separar, antes seja para ti, que me hás de respeitar, do que para algum desses aventureiros.” Cordial relations remained in place for a short time; in 1825, the countries signed an alliance described as “a mais perfeita amizade entre o Império do Brasil, e os Reinos de Portugal e Algarves, com total esquecimento das desavenças passadas entre os Povos respectivos” and advocating “a Paz, Amizade, e boa

---

62 Vieira argues that the movement of the court diminished the importance of Lisbon in Brazil, while the opening of the ports to other nations afforded the colony a greater degree of economic independence, fostering nationalist sentiments. See Vieira, p. 40.

harmonia entre Povos Irmãos”. Peace and harmony came to an abrupt end, however, with the Guerra dos Dois Irmãos. Upon João VI’s death in 1826, Pedro, fearing rebellion in Brazil, abdicated his claim to the Portuguese throne in favour of his daughter, Maria II, and oversaw the adoption of a liberal constitution in Portugal. In 1828, however, his brother Miguel returned to Portugal on the pretence of marrying his niece, but immediately declared himself king with the support of the absolutists, who rejected the constitution of 1826. The liberals eventually prevailed after Pedro, having also abdicated the Brazilian throne to his son, invaded Portugal to retake the crown, leading to Miguel’s exile and the return of Maria II to the throne in 1834. The bitter drama affected Portugal considerably for many years, and indeed Brazil, albeit to a lesser extent, each country experiencing the consequences of their ruling family’s wars and marriages in ways that intertwined their respective histories.

Given the considerable influence of (monarchic) family ties in Portuguese and Brazilian politics, involving a war of brothers that itself concerned the “fraternal” ideals of the French Revolution, it is unsurprising, perhaps, that relations between the two countries were often conceived rhetorically in terms of kinship, typified in the first treaty signed between “Povos Irmãos”. Later in 1880, as relations deteriorated further, Figueiredo Magalhães wrote in Camões e os Portugueses no Brasil:

Então Portugal foi metrópole, o Brasil foi colónia, Portugal descobre e desbrava, dá à luz e cria o Brasil, e fica o ascendente irmão do descendente? Que diabo de trapalhada de parentesco é esta?

Decrying the sudden pretence to equality between the two countries in the wake of their historic inequalities, Magalhães, like the diplomats that devised the first Luso-Brazilian alliance before him, deploys a kinship metaphor, though this time for the opposite effect: how can a dominant parent become, post-partum, a dependable brother? His expletive question is rhetorical, though it does have an (unspeakable) answer in intergenerational incest, invoking a non-normative representation of the human to articulate notions of exploitation, an insistent figuration of Luso-Brazilian relations that we will observe in this thesis. The recourse to kinship metaphors to describe international relations recalls one of the principles of psychoanalysis, whereby familial relationships go on to define those forged as an adult and at a societal level. Indeed, Magalhães’ articulation of

64 Ibid., pp. 72-3.
65 For a helpful timetable of events, see http://www.arqnet.pt/portal/portugal/liberalismo/lib1826.html (accessed 09/06/2017).
66 Cited by Vieira, p. 78.
67 This is the overarching argument of Freud’s Civilisation and its Discontents. See Sigmund Freud, Civilisation and its Discontents, translated by David McLintock (London: Penguin, 2002).
colonialism, conquest and cultural dependency — Portugal as “metrópole” — in the language of kinship and its “unnatural” inversion adduces the same signifying system as Freud: the family as the incarnation of relations of exploitation, dependency and control in society, here imagined as confused and nefarious.

The implication of the family in questions of economic dependency was explored directly in the fin de siècle, most notably by Friedrich Engels who, in 1886, related the growth and development of capitalism to the emergence of the patriarchal family. According to Engels, the agricultural revolution precipitated a monumental shift in the West from variously endogamous to strictly exogamous kinship and the corresponding “invention of incest”. As families and communities accumulated slaves, food and livestock as surplus property for the first time, inheritance became established through the male line, empowering the position of man — who became head of the family — over woman, in events he describes in characteristically dramatic terms as “the world historical defeat of the female sex”. From hereon in, family name, capital and bloodline were transmitted through the male heir. The transition from a communal, matriarchal, clan-based form of kinship to the exogamous, patriarchal family concentrated property in smaller social units and slowly established the societal structure with which we are today familiar: “[w]ith the patriarchal family,” as Engels argues, “we enter the field of written history”. However, the distribution of resources amongst these smaller, tighter units also brought about inequalities with respect to what was once shared, made all the starker by the new-found appetite for slave labour, for which subsistent tribal societies had no use. Hence the dark etymological roots of the word “family”, from Latin famulus, a domestic slave: the very terms of the patriarchal family are bound up with questions of ownership, property and dependency. As such, kinship proves a fruitful symbolic realm with which to articulate such notions, perhaps accounting, in part, for the dynamic of power experienced between Portugal and Brazil in the nineteenth century, so often imagined in terms of a (dys)functional family.

The extraordinarily barbed remarks of Figueiredo Magalhães, and the unusual transatlantic, Portuguese dynasty of the time thus form an inspiration for this thesis, but my decision to focus on kinship in relation to Naturalism in Portugal and Brazil extends beyond the often turbulent relationship of the two countries. Indeed, to consider kinship as a complex signifying system is to return to where I began, the problematic binary of “nature” and “culture” implicit in the greater part

---

70 Ibid., p. 65.
71 Ibid., p. 86.
72 Ibid., p. 88.
73 Ibid., p. 86.
of Western thought, and reaching a high point — or for others, a low point — in the Naturalist aesthetic itself. In a tradition that runs from Freud’s Totem and Taboo through the works of Claude Lévi-Strauss and social anthropology, kinship has long been considered “the primal arena for the confrontation of biological nature and cultural nurture”, indeed “the very province of human experience on which this dualism is supposed to be ultimately grounded”, being the means by which the human species organises into socio-cultural groups. In other words, kinship defines the limits of the “natural” (from Latin natura, “birth”) and the possible in human relationality and subjectivity: as Magalhães’ remark attests, one’s parent cannot, in the normative imagination, be one’s sibling. The exploration of kinship as a “precondition of the human” that defines and constrains the subject is the focus of Judith Butler’s Antigone’s Claim, which revisits Sophocles’ tragedy to argue that Antigone’s struggle to bury her brother’s body constitutes, on a figurative level, a fight for recognition within the kinship system. As both daughter and granddaughter of Jocasta, Antigone, the child of incest, “confounds the language of kinship”, being an essentially “unintelligible” figure exposing the limits of human experience and the symbolic order. Butler then extends the categorical scope of the “unintelligible” to include non-heterosexual individuals, drawing on Gayle Rubin’s insight that the incest taboo, in the capitalist, Western world at least, presupposes a taboo on homosexuality, both being required for the perpetuation of property down the male line. These “unintelligible” figures represent kinship’s “deformation and displacement”, and the taboos that render them unintelligible, supposedly the point of transition from nature to culture, in fact constitute fault lines along which ideas of “nature”, “culture” and the “unnatural” are produced. Antigone is “unnatural” only insofar as her body transgresses a culturally specific taboo on incest, collapsing, like the declaration of the anthropocene, any viable distinction between 74 Freud, for example, like Engels before him, argues that “primitive man” developed an increasingly strict incest taboo to form the more “advanced” socio-cultural groups that we recognise today. See Freud, Totem and Taboo, translated by Abraham A. Brill (New York: Cosimo Classics, 2009), pp. 3-25.

---

80 Butler, p. 24.
nature and culture. To recognise the “unintelligible”, this trapalhada de parentesco, is thus to apprehend the cultural forces that delimit “natural” human experience, performing the inverse of Zola’s formula.

By investigating the representation of kinship in Lusophone Naturalist works, then, I mean to problematise the nature-culture binary as implicated in the construction of the patriarchal-capitalist world in the nineteenth century, where the strict social and sexual code that perpetuated the interests of the bourgeoisie was offered an intellectual basis in “natural” phenomena. Kinship, too, presents a site for tackling in conjunction the evasive categories of “deviance” of the fin de siècle, which moved with ease through questions of gender, sexuality, race and class. Given that race, especially when seen in the context of the miscegenation debate in Brazil, is tied to notions of heritage and bloodline, there is good reason to include it in an analysis of kinship. In this sense, the thesis sidesteps the thorny debate about how to “do” the history of homosexuality, for example, by considering its invention and prohibition — vícios contra a natureza, according to the Portuguese penal code of 1912 — as inextricably tied to other taboos and “deviances” from a bourgeois mode of being, desiring and reproducing. Accordingly, although same-sex desire features prominently in my readings of the novels at hand, I will focus on a variety of “aberrations” of patriarchal kinship, including incest and that other great taboo on the confusion of bloodlines, interracial sex. My aim, in part, is to respond to a passing remark by António Cândido in his now-classic essay, “De Cortiço a Cortiço”, in which he claims that Lusophone Naturalist writers, in supposed contrast to their Northern European counterparts, often preoccupied themselves with same-sex desire. He explains this phenomenon as a “degradação do enfoque ‘natural’ de Zola”, as part of his wider argument that the writers adapted the Naturalist model for an economically

---

81 Gilberto Freyre, for example, implicitly brings together these notions in Casa Grande e Senzala (Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1964), where he analyses the Brazilian family in terms of its origins in the slave economy.

82 Theorists disagree on whether the invention of the homosexual in the nineteenth century invalidates modern attempts to compare the experience of same-sex desire across history. See, for example, John Boswell, “Revolutions, Universals, and Sexual Categories”, in Hidden From History: Reclaiming the Gay and Lesbian Past, edited by Martin Duberman, Martha Vicinus and George Chauncy (London: Penguin, 1991), pp. 17-36. For the opposite view see David Halperin, “Sex Before Sexuality: Pederasty, Politics, and Power in Classical Athens”, op. cit., pp. 37-53. Although the concept of homosexuality was in any case crystallising at the turn of the century, this thesis is not directly concerned with its occurrence in the novels at hand, focusing instead on the limits of the language of relationality.

83 See Diário do Governo, no. 177 (Lisboa, 20th July 1912), pp. 2714-5 (held at Biblioteca Nacional de Portugal).

84 Desire, of course, characterised by Eve Sedgwick as “the glue or force of attachment that binds individuals together”, is implicated in the kinship debate insofar as it mobilises social cohesion and division. See Eve Sedgwick, Between Men: English Literature and Male Homosocial Desire (New York: Colombia University Press, 1985), p. 2.

85 See Cândido, p. 127.
“underdeveloped” context. Since António Carlos Santos has competently called Cândido out on his reproduction of the same marginalising discourse that he so deftly unpicks elsewhere in the essay, my aim is to offer a more nuanced hypothesis: that the disruption to the accepted structure of kinship across the Lusophone movement can be read as a challenge to the foundations of the patriarchal-capitalist, globalised world that variously marginalised Portugal and Brazil, and that increasingly sought to represent them, in the fin de siècle, as “naturally” inferior. This is the process I would like to call writing “against nature”, which strikes a chord between non-normative kinship and relationality — “crimes contra a natureza” — and the attempt to deal with the problematic implications of Naturalist discourse.

If the Lusophone Naturalists often wrote “against nature”, it is important, of course, not to characterise the process as a particularly systematic or concerted one. On the contrary, readers should ready themselves for, at times, decidedly forthright depictions of people in physiological terms; when, in Aluísio Azevedo’s O Mulato, the obese Lindoca is described in great detail as a farm animal, “boleada”, with “banhas”, “enxúndias” and a “lombinho” for a nose, the author evidently moves towards, not against “nature” in representation. The uneven and disperse manner of the Lusophone disruption to the movement as a whole can thus be conceived in terms of what Marx and Engels referred to as the principle of contradiction, whereby every work of art or literature must, at some level, contain or express ideological values that are not always shared by those of the author and his social group. Hence, in feminist criticism, the now-familiar debate about to what extent nineteenth-century writers sympathised with their housebound female characters. This principle is similar to the Freudian idea that in speech, latent (unconscious) thoughts are conveyed alongside what was “meant” to be said. As Cora Kaplan puts it, “in each speech act the self and the culture speak simultaneously […] each time we speak we are also spoken”. Accordingly, I take as axiomatic the notion that the Lusophone Naturalists both reproduced and criticised the prejudices of the time. Indeed, the criticism is often contained within the reproduction itself. Since Derrida’s theorisation of speech as a series of reiterations with no definable origin, each enunciation being a (paradoxically) unique copy as in a game of Chinese whispers, postcolonial criticism has drawn attention to the tendency of marginal literature to adopt cultural trends from centres of dominance only to reiterate them in subversive ways. In “Nacional por subtração”, for example, Roberto Schwarz argues that Brazilian literature should be read in the supplemental space that unfolds at the point of divergence from European cultural models, with the “national” aspect of cultural production residing precisely in its status as a “copy”.\(^{91}\) When the Lusophone Naturalists wrote “against nature”, it was a distortion of a European discourse that they nonetheless, if in different measure, sought to reproduce. My readings thus seek to demonstrate how the texts at hand offer an uncannily different, complementary representation of the nineteenth-century world to those made by the fin-de-siècle pseudoscientists of northern Europe.

87 Aluísio Azevedo, O Mulato (São Paulo: Klick Editora, 1999), pp. 79-80.

90 See, for example, Jacques Derrida, “Signature Event Context”, in Limited Inc (Evanston, IL, 1997), pp. 1-25.

The principle of contradiction, which implies that works of art can challenge the status quo to a greater or lesser degree, also lies behind my decision to include authors from a range of positions within the literary market and — which is not to imply a causal relationship — the literary canon. One of the most persistent criticisms of Naturalism at the time was that its authors employed a cheap, sordid formula to provoke scandal and sell their books. Botelho’s O Barão de Lavos suffered this accusation perhaps most of all, though Júlio Ribeiro’s A Carne, which carries the unfortunate reputation of the worst novel in the history of Brazilian literature,\(^{92}\) must run it close. In Páginas de Sensação, Alessandra El Far examines this sensationalist aspect of the Lusophone literary market at the time, finding an overlap between censored pornographic novels, titillating low-brow works, and even those now considered centrepieces of the Lusophone novelistic canon, in their capacity to excite a scandalised — and growing — bourgeois readership. Thus when Eça’s O primo Basílio was published in Brazil, it was given the same euphemistic designation of “romance para homens” as prohibited pornographic works.\(^{93}\) That said, Eça’s novels have evidently attracted an enduring readership amongst critics that Botelho’s have not, despite their popularity during his lifetime; O Barão de Lavos, as a case in point, has attracted very little attention from critics. Azevedo and Caminha’s works have fared rather better, but a reluctance to speak of them with critical acclaim persists. By comparing a diverse range of authors, then, I wish to account for how the Naturalist representation of kinship modulates according to the degree to which writers succeeded in gratifying a bourgeois readership that was growing quickly in the urban centres of the Lusophone world.

This thesis therefore employs several theoretical perspectives that can, it is hoped, work productively together. On the one hand, the focus on the literary market, the kinship structure and the system of economic dependency at the fin de siècle owes much to Marxist criticism, itself, of course, born of the social struggles of the nineteenth century. On the other hand, consideration of the aftermath of empire and slavery, and the decision to read the texts in relation to their Northern European models, draws on key principles of postcolonial theory. As part of the investigation of kinship trouble, meanwhile, I deploy psychoanalysis to navigate the complex interplay of desire and identification that makes and unmakes families. However, the thesis is also indebted to queer theory insofar as it undertakes an analysis of “deviant”, non-normative relationality — including incest — seeking to move beyond the problematic framework that produces the socially “abnormal”, and that has arisen in different, though interrelated forms since the nineteenth century. Indeed, I wish to explore the connection between deviance in being, desiring and reproducing, and deviance in representation — Naturalism against nature — which offers an opportunity to bring together queer and postcolonial theory with the same analytical goal in mind. A particularly helpful definition of “queerness” in this respect is offered by José Esteban Muñoz: “an ideality”; “a mode of desiring that allows us to see beyond the quagmire of the present”, and “the rejection of a here and now and an insistence on potentiality or concrete possibility for another world”. So defined, the “queer” is loosened from any residual association with “homosexual” desire to include the more general sense of that which eludes assimilation into the symbolic order of the socio-historical moment, pointing, consequently, to different possible modes of being. Considering that the Brazilian postcolonial critics encourage readers to search for deviances in representation at the margins of the Western world, there are notable points of contact to be established between the two disciplines that Murat Aydemir criticises for being “largely distinct programs” at universities, suggesting an “apparent need to keep sex and race at some distance from each other”. Running counter to this spirit, I hope to bring the two together productively; for example, as we shall see, the surprising use of allegories of nationhood in the novels — an apparent departure from the French Naturalist model — can also pressure the established structure of the family such that it becomes sterile, dysfunctional, or otherwise “unnatural”. Another such departure from the Naturalist formula is seen in the recourse to Greek modes of understanding and representing beauty, desire and the family. By teasing out these discursive disruptions to Naturalism, therefore, I hope to expose the “queer” at the level of the text.

---

\(^{92}\) Loos, p. 54.

The present thesis is divided into four chapters, each dedicated to a particular author. The first examines Abel Botelho’s O Barão de Lavos, the story of a “degenerate” Portuguese aristocrat who falls fatally in love with a scheming, adolescent street urchin. While I analyse the work to explore degeneration theory in more detail, it becomes apparent that the fraught formula of the so-called “pathological” novel — a medicalised formulation of Naturalism — contains its own dissolution. “Degeneracy” proves surprisingly generative, with a series of neologisms and creative wordplay that evoke the intellectual zeitgeist in exemplary fashion. The second chapter proceeds to the centre of the literary canon to consider the novels of Eça de Queirós. Drawing on studies of incest in his work, I argue that an indeterminacy in the nature of desire between men pressures the language of relationality and kinship at the level of signification, thus challenging the structure of the family and the objectivist fantasies of Naturalist discourse in the same gesture. Then, in the third and fourth chapters, I turn to Naturalism in Brazil, firstly to consider the novels of Aluísio Azevedo, and then one of the most puzzling works of the literary movement, Adolfo Caminha’s Bom Crioulo which, in many ways a subversive reiteration of O Barão de Lavos, illustrates well the “corruption” of Naturalism over the course of its global travels. As we shall see, the Brazilian authors infuse Naturalist discourse with other literary styles to foster alternative epistemologies, problematising normative kinship in a renegotiation European theories. Unsurprisingly, race is a more pressing concern in Brazilian Naturalism. But the movement on both sides of the Atlantic in fact deploys similar methods to write against the naturalising representations of the human that characterised the period.

---

Criticised for being a “non-aesthetic”,\(^\text{96}\) inimical to the arts and, later, a vehicle for cementing dangerous cultural prejudices in people’s minds,\(^\text{97}\) Naturalism has not, perhaps, been received anywhere with the same critical enthusiasm as the aesthetic movements that it preceded and followed.\(^\text{98}\) Even the work of Azevedo, the most celebrated Brazilian Naturalist, is described as “geralmente medíocre” by António Cândido,\(^\text{99}\) while Nelson Sodré, in his broad study of the movement in Brazil, finds no works of any notable creative value.\(^\text{100}\) It would take more than one study to address this curious aversion to the last literary movement before Modernism’s revolutionary embrace of subjectivity in narration. By investigating Lusophone Naturalism, however, produced on the margins of Western world in the nineteenth century, it is hoped the present thesis can take a step towards revising the role that the movement played in its heyday, both in shaping and understanding the fin-de-siècle world and in problematising the nature-culture binary that continues to define human experience.

---

\(^{96}\) See Loos, p. 22.

\(^{97}\) Brookshaw, p. 41.

\(^{98}\) Although Eça admittedly constitutes an exception to the rule, perhaps because of his ill-disguised disillusionment with the movement, no other Naturalist writer quite makes it to the centre of the Lusophone canon. Azevedo, Caminha and Botelho, for example, although key figures within the movement itself, are certainly not household names in the same manner as José de Alencar, Almeida Garrett, Oswald de Andrade and Mário de Sá Carneiro.

\(^{99}\) Cândido, p. 112.

\(^{100}\) Sodré, p. 225.
Chapter I: Abel Botelho

Introduction

Published in 1891 as part of a series entitled Patologia Social, Abel Botelho’s O Barão de Lavos is the most renowned so-called “pathological novel” written in Portuguese, though it has attracted more critical attention for its scandalous subject matter — an aristocrat’s ruinous passion for a young efebo — than its literary craftsmanship. Indeed, there is very little written about the novel at all in modern times beyond an article-length study by Robert Howes, short entries in so-called “gay histories”, analyses of the Brazilian novel that it inspired, Bom-Crioulo, and an unpublished Master’s thesis by Maria Limão de Andrade. With critics having proven reluctant to regard the novel as part of the established literary canon, instead presenting Lavos as a landmark artefact of changing times, “fatally flawed…but nevertheless interesting for being one of the first novels to deal with homosexuality explicitly”, there remains ample space for close reading that has not, arguably, been adequately explored. Howes convincingly sets the novel in the context of several homosexual scandals that appear to have inspired Botelho, including the Marquês de Valada and Rua do Trombeta affairs that I discussed in the introduction. He also, importantly, finds 1 Abel Botelho, O Barão de Lavos (Porto: Lello & Irmão, 1982). All page references are to this edition.

---

4 See e.g. Leonardo Mendes, O Retrato do Imperador: Negociação, sexualidade e romance naturalista no Brasil (Porto Alegre: Edipucrs), p. 193 moments that are “almost subversive”\textsuperscript{8} to the otherwise pervasive pathological discourse. Participating as it does in the sexual panic of the period, reflected too in the three hundred copies that sold in the week following publication,\textsuperscript{9} and containing notable discursive inconsistencies, the novel emerges as a compelling candidate for an analysis of Naturalism “against nature”.

6 As Aubrey Bell wrote in 1922, “This may be magnificent pathology, but it is not art or literature.” See Howes, Who’s Who…, p. 64.

In the present chapter, then, I would like to build on previous studies in several ways. Firstly, I would like to introduce the novel as paradigmatic of the “scientific” approach to literature first developed by Zola and, in a broader sense, of fin-de-siècle sexual panic, exploring how the movement of the narrative parallels contemporaneous patterns of thought. I argue that any seemingly subversive moments are largely contingencies of a discourse that attempts to articulate and restrict the evasive concept of sexuality that was increasingly used to buttress the bourgeois family model. Paradoxically, however, an explosion of neologisms and pseudo-scientific vocabulary is witnessed in the process such that “degeneracy” becomes surprisingly generative. I will then turn more closely to the problematic relationships in the text to elicit the ways in which kinship trouble is implicated in class and gender struggles. As a series of figurative “closets” are opened over the course of the novel, releasing a contagion of sexual “deviance”, criminality and working-class culture into the seemingly cloistered bourgeois world, Lavos depicts a society deeply preoccupied with the upheavals of the late nineteenth century which, imagined alongside the degeneration of kinship and the nation’s “stock”, echo the cries of the racial theorists in Northern Europe. However, I will then discuss the allegorical appearance of Dom Sebastião, Portugal’s most disastrous, and possibly “queer” monarch, with which Botelho implicates kinship trouble in Portuguese national decline. Here, the spectre of Dom Sebastião is similarly unflattering to the nation, but the use of allegory also marks a divergence from Naturalism and the scientific method, a moment in which Botelho writes against nature, and a point of departure for the subsequent readings in this thesis.

\emph{O Barão de Lavos} tells the story of Dom Sebastião de Lavos, a Portuguese aristocrat from an ancient family and last in his line. He is introduced, somewhat improbably perhaps, as the descendent of generations of sodomites reaching far back into the pederastic culture of ancient Greece — in \emph{Lavos}, as I have already indicated, the “degenerate” can be surprisingly generative. Beginning at the Lisbon circus, where Sebastião scouts for adolescent boys willing to sleep with him for money, the novel depicts the protagonist’s gradual descent into moral, social and financial ruin as he develops an uncontrollable passion for a poor, young and handsome \emph{maroto}, Eugénio. Sebastião maintains Eugénio in an apartment on the Rua da Rosa, hiding him from his social circle. Predictably (\emph{Lavos} is not a novel in which to expect the unexpected), the attachment throws Sebastião’s relationship with his wife, Elvira, into turmoil. Increasingly reckless in his precarious double life which, as Howes notes, echoes the lives of several high-profile aristocrats of the time,\textsuperscript{10} the Baron starts to invite Eugénio to dine at his Lisbon \textit{palacete} and "educates" him as his protégé, introducing him to privileged life at great personal expense. Meanwhile, injured and bored by her husband's inattentions, and after initially despising Eugénio despite knowing nothing of the affair, Elvira is seduced by the \textit{efebo} herself \textit{às escondidas}, initiating a bizarre, intergenerational love triangle that cements Eugénio's growing power. As husband and wife fall hopelessly for the same boy, Eugénio bleeds the family coffers dry whilst playing an impossible game of duplicity. The game is brought to an end when Sebastião, tipped off by a jealous maid, discovers his wife and Eugénio \textit{in flagrante delicto}, whereupon the family scandal spreads citywide and the Baron flees abroad on the pretext of a "grand tour". On his return to Lisbon, the Baron, now almost destitute, experiments with some shady business ventures before resigning himself to a life of poverty and misery. Finally, disfigured by syphilis and prostituting himself to support his precarious existence in a dark basement, Sebastião is brutally attacked by a group of youths in the Avenida da Liberdade; his dramatic but almost unnoticed death marks the end of the novel. Although \textit{Lavos} is uncompromisingly explicit and caused a stir among critics, it was never prohibited, not even by the repressive Salazar regime,\textsuperscript{11} and despite a number of books being banned at the time of publication.\textsuperscript{12} As Howes suggests, this was no doubt because of the novel's strongly moralising tone, which led many to believe that \textit{Lavos} was aimed at encouraging the sexually deviant to renounce their "vices",\textsuperscript{13} a hypothesis that will now be put to the test.

\footnote{Robert Howes, “Concerning the Eccentricities…”, p. 39.}
\footnote{Howes, “Concerning the Eccentricities…”, p. 33.}

\textit{O Barão de Lavos} and the pathological novel

With its predictable plot and focus on one particular "vice", \textit{Lavos} is a prominent example of literary pathology, a genre that emerged at the end of the nineteenth century and that in many ways intensifies the principles of Naturalism, sometimes \textit{ad absurdum}. However, whilst it is the general scientific method that informs Naturalism, social pathology takes the medical sciences as its chief inspiration,\textsuperscript{14} with the protagonist developing a "disease" and typically suffering unto death. The narrator adopts the voice of the doctor, sitting at the "dramatic convergence of knowledge and \textsuperscript{10} See Howes, "Concerning the eccentricities...".

\textsuperscript{11} Ibid, p. 34.
\textsuperscript{13} Howes, "Concerning the eccentricities...", p. 33.
\textsuperscript{14} See Peter Cryle, "Foretelling Pathology: The Poetics of Prognosis", in \textit{French Cultural Studies}, vol. 17 no. 1, pp. 107-122.
power”,\textsuperscript{15} and drastically foreclosing narrative outcomes such that “medical power-knowledge […] comes to be inscribed, in some circumstances, as novelistic fatality.”\textsuperscript{16} That Botelho named his most renowned series of novels \textit{Patologia Social} testifies to the enthusiasm with which he brought to Portugal what had started as a French literary trend. His efforts chimed with the ambitions of three prominent Portuguese physicians of the period, Egas Moniz (awarded a Novel Prize in 1949 for inventing the lobotomy),\textsuperscript{17} Sousa Martins and Miguel Bombarda, who called for the scientific method in all aspects of life,\textsuperscript{18} ambitions to an extent shared by the earlier \textit{geração de '70}, but now invested with an overtly medical thrust. In \textit{Lavos}, Botelho’s recourse to the language of medicine leaves the reader in no doubt about the “disease” in question, although it is never definitively named, being called variously “pederastia”, “sodomia” and even “neuropatia” and “andromania”. Of course, the interchangeability of the Biblical “sodomia” with contemporaneous scientific terminology demonstrates the ease with which a much older discourse of sin and redemption is supplanted by a pseudo-medical discourse of illness and cure, accounting for \textit{Lavos}’ “scientifically” justified moralism when it was really a case of the morals justifying the science. As Robert Howes notes, at times the medical language becomes so dense as to detract significantly from reading the story.\textsuperscript{19} The penultimate chapter, depicting the Baron’s final days of misery, is particularly tortuous: he develops:

\begin{quote}
dolorosas sensações de estrangulamento em volta da cinta, no tórax, nos rins, em toda a região intestinal; com sobressaltos de tendões, súbitas alternâncias de frio e calor nas extremidades, formigueiros, cócegas; nevralgias viscerais, violentas crises gástricas, vômitos biliosos; e um sentimento de opressão nos brônquios, sufocações, estases de pulso, dores lombares, tenesmos. (pp. 388-9).
\end{quote}

In this manner, the narrative can become so crowded with medical terminology that it is difficult to tell where the latter ends and the story begins,\textsuperscript{20} as though in surrender to the unstoppable forces of “nature” and physiology. The Baron’s grotesque deterioration in symptoms, a medical punishment for a moral sin, dictates that death alone can bring an end to the novel. The pretense to medical authority comes at the considerable price of rendering only one narrative outcome possible.

\textsuperscript{15} Ibid, p. 113.
\textsuperscript{16} Ibid, p. 114.
\textsuperscript{18} Limão de Andrade, 12.
\textsuperscript{19} Howes, p. 63.
\textsuperscript{20} Cryle, p. 109.
However, whilst the “pathological” approach may impose considerable limitations on narrative outcomes, suppressing other possible modes of being, it is also self-justifying due to the deterministic assumptions of degeneration theory upon which Botelho draws considerably. As I discussed in the introduction, degenerationists placed human beings at different stages of evolution; at the top of the evolutionary chain stood white, northwestern Europeans, and at the bottom were black and African peoples. The categories of analysis were fluid and overlapped: although skin colour appeared to inform their hierarchisation, it was then equally argued that the “inferior” races could be identified by their more liberal attitudes to sexual practices. Havelock Ellis began his analysis of homosexuals by listing their “race” and “ancestry”, whilst Krafft-Ebing himself speaks of the “sodomitic idolatry… of Ancient Greece” that modern society has supposedly moved “beyond”. Within this schema, homosexuality — as “it” had by then been coined, though still not popularly — indicated a “degenerate”, atavistic reversion, doomed to extinction, that could then be medically isolated and purged. The inevitability of the narrative in Lavos is thus not only justified by the the medical voice that represents desire as a terminal illness, but becomes part of a seizing of power by the narrator, who is given a doctor’s authority to marginalise and remove the sexually deviant.

Botelho’s close adherence to degeneration theory is further evident in the details of the “disease”. When Sebastião develops syphilis, for example — named quite candidly in the book, despite being almost unutterable at the time — he develops the physical manifestation of what is initially introduced as a psycho-pathological condition. Syphilis was such a public concern in Europe at the turn of the century that newspapers spoke of “venereal peril” and the “syphilisation” of the western world. As Susan Sontag and others have suggested, the AIDS crisis in the 1980s was akin to the syphilis scare of the fin de siècle, in that both saw the physical illnesses semantically undershot with sexual licentiousness.

Syphilis was the marker of sexual deviance par excellence (though unlike AIDS, not of sexual orientation), and in Lavos it becomes part of the wider search for the deviant, homosexual body. Like illness, race too becomes bound up with deviant sexuality in the novel with the appearance of a “degenerate” black priest. When Sebastião returns from his travels, he pays for sex with another young efebo at a brothel:

---

21 See e.g. Arthur Balfour, Decadence (Cambridge: CUP, 1908) for an archetypal treatise on degeneration. Available at https://archive.org/stream/decadencehenrys01ballgoog#page/n6/mode/2up

26 Ibid, p. 189.

Ao cabo, num desmedido horror de si mesmo, sem poder explicar-se como baixara àquela abjeção suprema, o barão balbuciou:
— Nunca ninguém te tinha feito isto...?
Ao que o rapaz, filosofalmente [sic], abotoando-se:
— Ainda ontem... um padre. Era preto. (p. 380)

The black priest here demonstrates how representations of race and sexuality readily overlap. In a novel populated almost exclusively by white, upper-class and bourgeois lisboetas, the priest’s blackness appears unusual, working to consolidate the perception of degeneracy, both sexual and racial, and thus distance him from — and comfort — the overwhelmingly white, bourgeois readership. Nevertheless, the implication that the Catholic church, a centrepiece of Portuguese society at the time, is “corrupted”, apparently by the very colonial other that the Portuguese sought to “civilise” and convert, curiously reintroduces the risk of contagion once more. Indeed, as we shall see, the contagion is never adequately contained in the novel, despite such moments as this where degeneration theory suddenly rears its head with that precise purpose, moulding the narrative to the “science”. Interestingly, Bom Crioulo, which I turn to at the end of this thesis, recovers race from the “degenerate” margins to the centre of the story with its black hero and protagonist, leading, in part, to a problematisation of the theory. The black priest in Lavos, by contrast, like the surrender of plot to prognosis, works to confirm the theory; as Howes writes, O Barão de Lavos “is controlled by the tenets of degeneration theory in its most extreme Lombrosian form.”

Freedom in madness? The limits of literary pathology

Such moments of structural transparency in the novel, where the theory becomes visible even to the point of pressuring verisimilitude — this latter supposedly cherished by the Naturalists, of course — betray a wider tension between story and theory, freedom and determinism, and indeed “nature” and “culture”. Degeneration theory, drawing on positivist convictions that all phenomena are empirically calculable and that some individuals are born degenerate,\textsuperscript{30} leaves little or no wriggle room for agency. Desire becomes disease; failure to comply with the bourgeois sexual code, far from threatening to expose the latter as cultural, is given a “natural”, pathological explanation. When played out in novel form, the pathological approach gives rise to an apparent conflict between, on the one hand, the deterministic theory that dooms the “diseased” protagonist to worsening illness and death, and, on the other, an attempt to endow the same protagonist with subjectivity and a plausible inner life. The tension is so great that at times, the narrative questions the entire positivist epistemological system on which the novel precariously rests. As Howes remarks, “a careful reader can find a number of different viewpoints in the novel, which makes it more than a simple anti-homosexual diatribe”, resulting at times in “an ambivalence that is almost subversive”.\textsuperscript{31} I would now like to explore such instances more closely to ask to what extent the Baron’s ostensibly transgressive thoughts trouble the doctor’s overbearing perspective. Is there, perhaps, a limit to the narrator’s grasp of events, beyond which an alternative voice can be heard?

One such ostensibly “different viewpoint” in the novel, which Howes himself cites as an example, occurs immediately after the aforementioned episode at the brothel. When the young man reveals to Sebastião that he is one of many pederasts in Lisbon, a remarkable passage of free indirect discourse ensues in which the Baron calls the fundamental tenets of bourgeois morality into question, including its tight restrictions on sexual desire and their newfound justification in a universalising “science”:

Deixou fulminado esta resposta de surpresa e de assombro o barão. — Como!?... Então não era só ele?... Outros havia também que... E muitos, talvez, quem sabe?... Muitos, sim, provavelmente... Muitos! Bem mais do que ele, do que o mundo imaginava!

— E porque não?... Que fizera ele de condenável, no fim de contas?... — na subsequente vibração da insânia, aventurava. — Quem sabe uma palavra da natureza das coisas? […] Quem de dizer-lhe onde começa o vício e onde acaba a virtude?... Lérias! Não há ignominias que se transmutam em glórias?... Cristo, por exemplo! — E tinha um riso cínico. — Nada sobre o caso de ciência certa sabemos. Os nossos modos triviais de pensar e sentir... as nossas predileções, antipatias, jeitos de ver, tendências... as nossas adorações, os nossos ódios, nada têm de racional, de sólido em que se estribem. Nenhum princípio universal e eterno que lhes defina a essência. Pelo contrário, a sua compreensão é ilusória e falível, porque oscila à mercê dos preconceitos... Tal ação é magnânima porque assim vem considerada, por uns tantos homens; tal outra é ignominiosa... porque convém que o seja! Ora adeus!…

[…]

E o barão, já na rua, tudo era ainda meditar e bordar atenuantes sobre a extraordinária revelação do rapaz. Alçava com orgulho a cabeça, sentia-se reabilitado, reavía a própria estima. — Isto do bem e do mal, da justiça e da iniquidade, da razão e do desvario, da santidade e do crime, era tudo relativo. Estava por fixar e medir o estalão do vício... E mesmo, afinal, pensando bem, essa ácida gota de linfa que lhe jorrara aos lábios, era uma coisa pura, transcendental, sagrada... era o gérmen misterioso da vida, o líquido fecundo e nobre por excelência... era o divino plasma de todos nós. (p. 380-1, my italics).

These lines bring chapter XIV to a close, adding weight to this extended free indirect discourse that sits at odds with the condemnation tone of the doctor. What has elsewhere been described as a gruesome disease becomes the “divino plasma de todos nós”, a corporeal metaphor, but this time one of vitality, turning the pathological discourse on its head. Sebastião goes on to question the fundamental principles of science when applied to “os nossos modos [...] de sentir” which, as we have seen, overwhelm the narrative elsewhere. “Quem sabe uma palavra da natureza das coisas? [...] nada tem de racional.” I have added in italics the moment where the doctor’s voice returns, ensuring that the scandalous passage is clearly “diagnosed” as “vibração da insânia”, the musings of a lunatic. Similarly, the following chapter opens with one of the most chastising passages of the novel:

O subsequente descrasear desta vida latrinária [sic], as últimas anotações da torpe monografia, hemos de deixá-las apontadas a correr, em fugacíssimas legendas, acossados nesta pressa nauseada e medrosa do viajante que se vê forçado a saltilhar [sic] a deletéria vasa de um pântano.

Porque, de ora avante, a vida do barão arrasta-se, turporosa [sic] e lôbrega, pelas inconfessadas volutas da chatinagem mais sórdida; e resvala às ínfimas degradações do pulhismo, da miséria, da loucura e da infâmia... A loucura em que ele se afundara sem remédio, no momento em que deixou por completo as suas paixões dominarem-no.

Tinha na alma a corrupção do século (p. 382).

So keen is the narrator to distance himself from identification with Sebastião that he must dismiss his own monograph as “torpe”. He scrambles to describe the transgressions before him with a spate of neologisms, suggesting a deficiency in his ready vocabulary. “Latrinária” performs a semantic slippage from deviant sexuality to waste and sewage, a discourse sufficiently indecorous to leave any nineteenth-century reader flushed. “Saltilhar”, meanwhile, is of more doubtful origins, but might be a mixing of “saltar” with “ilhar”: a jump into isolation. (Interestingly, it is the narrator who feels this way inclined, even to the point of becoming nauseous in telling Sebastião’s story. Is the doctor developing his patient’s illness, the “corrupção do século”? I will return to this possibility later.) Finally, the image of the Baron’s life dragging itself down, “turporosa [sic] e lôbrega”, into spiralling misery, suggests an excessive materiality to life, a sluggish immanence, a vision of the soul as body. Momentarily then, Sebastião’s desires are given free reign within the text, escaping the prescriptive vocabulary of “medicine” and the law; however, immediately following his rumination on the arbitrariness of that law, the doctor returns with still greater moralistic force. A barrage of scornful adjectives describes the final years of his sorry life; any prior moments of questioning are quickly stamped out.

In this sense, Lavos manages to sustain a remarkable degree of internal contradiction. On the one hand, the narrator seamlessly blends medical and moral judgement to launch a vicious attack on the sexually deviant protagonist. On the other hand, the same narrator — equally seamlessly — introduces extensive free indirect discourse to question the principles that underpin that judgement. The very notion of free indirect discourse, as Monika Fludernik describes it, is an “evocation of subjectivity” within another’s subjectivity by means of grammatical cues; Jacob L. Mey argues that the technique can mean the character is apparently “freed from the constraints of the narrative voice”. The reader is presented with two opposing perspectives: the insistence on terminal illness that deprives Sebastião of any ability to overcome his plight, and what seems like his defiant agency. The result is an ongoing dialectic ending only with the Baron’s death, reminiscent of Foucault’s “Preface à la Transgression”, which establishes the absolute interdependency of transgression and the law. Indeed, the totalising medical voice actively requires the Baron’s transgressions for its very definition, depending on something that must be forcibly denied. The free indirect discourse thus often becomes paradoxically complicit with the narrator’s assertions; once more, degeneration proves surprisingly generative. Without this tacit complicity, of course, the theory could hardly be sketched into four hundred pages of social pathology.

The vai-e-vem of perspectives in the novel thus recalls Mikhail Bakhtin’s concept of the monological narrative, in which characters exist only in order to enact and confirm the author’s ideology. However, equally for Bakhtin, “there can be no actual monologue”, the underlying “dialogic imperative” of human language meaning that “monologic” writing amounts to a seizure of power attained through silencing other voices. In Lavos, although Sebastião serves as an object to be marginalised and sacrificed to establish the primacy of bourgeois morality, and his narrated thoughts can end up complying, structurally, with those of the narrator, the degree to which his voice is silenced is questionable. At no point does Sebastião accept or share the narrator’s view that he is morally reprehensible, or express regret for his life “choices”; on the contrary, as we have seen, he often stresses his guiltlessness. Botelho may strive towards monologism, but in the end, as we shall see, the Baron’s autonomy is never entirely kept in check, and some degree of polyphony escapes.

The potential for polyphony is confirmed at the end of the penultimate chapter, when the Baron resigns himself to a life of squalor and abjection. Whilst, as we have seen, the narrator revels in the horrors of his “vida latrinária”, Sebastião actively seeks and becomes content with a life of supposed “misery”. Firstly, whilst the Marquês de Torredeita offers his bankrupt friend “uma hospedagem generosa distinta, alojando-o numa das grandes salas senhoriais do andar nobre”, Sebastião opts to “acomodar-se numa horrível cela do rés-do-chão, mal branqueada a cal, em perene divórcio do sol, escura, salitrosa, com uma janela baixa de grades e porta direta para a rua” (p. 383-4). This affords him “a maior soma possível de liberdade, de isolamento e de mistério.” It is the desire to preserve his freedom, and not necessity, that leads the Baron to live in the squalid, ground-floor cell. Meanwhile, unlike the attics and basements that tend to house nineteenth-century literary “lunatics”, such as the narrator of Notes from Underground or the first Mrs Rochester, the ground floor is the most exposed to the street and the outside world. Sebastião and the city have easy access to each other, suggesting a cycle of potential mutual “corruption”, and the possibility that this corruption might not be as isolated as the reader, or even narrator, might like to think. Is the doctor catching his patient’s disease? Sebastião’s choice of furnishing is still more expressive of his agency:

Um simples catre de ferro, pintado a preto, quatro cadeiras de palhinha, lavatório de ferro também, com espelho, guarda-fato, uma mesa, e suspenso na parede fronteira ao leito o seu velho Rapto de Ganimedes. — A única joia que do radioso bazar de S. Cristóvão ele havia conservado.

Continuava, acima de tudo, adorando-a. Era a melhor, a mais latejante parcela de si mesmo. Era o seu ídolo, o seu talismã, a sua divisa, o seu timbre. Votava-lhe um culto incondicional, uma ardente e religiosa ternura. Delicioso traslado da sua alma... síntese dulceral dos seus desejos, das suas ambições, dos seus ideais, do seu destino. Era o símbolo das perturbações da sua carne, era uma celeste alegoria «travestindo» em graça as abominações do seu viver.

Nas suas horas mais sentidamente angustiadas, nas frequentes intercadências de dor e de desânimo, o barão, numa súplica, fitava-a... e estava animado, feliz... e estava contente. (p 384).
The only object that Sebastião retains from his previous life is his most prized possession, the engraving of the Rape of Ganymede. The homoerotic engraving is invested with particular importance in the novel. At the beginning, it is the Baron’s fascination and, as Limão de Andrade argues, appears as a corrupting influence. Later, during a dinner party at which Sebastião cautiously (and disastrously) discusses male beauty, he makes reference to the engraving when arguing for the existence of homoeroticism throughout history. Here, at the end of the novel, it becomes the centrepiece of his new life, his talisman and fetish (derived from the Portuguese feitiço, something invested with magical powers). The engraving, indeed, charms Sebastião where the narrator only sees “abominações” (from Latin abominatio, that which is “shun as an ill omen”) as though it disguises a curse — a curiously metaphysical resonance for a doctor’s “diagnosis”. The similarly remarkable appearance of the word “travestindo”, equating this false charm to the deceitful power of crossdressing, exemplifies the way in which the narrator’s policing of sexuality readily encroaches into gender norms, as the discourse of the former struggles to control its object. But to Sebastião, the engraving is a confirmation of his individuality and affirmation of independence (for Freud, the fetish is a “token of triumph over the threat of castration and a protection against it”). Is this the moment in the dialectic in which the slave recognises himself in his own work? That merely contemplating the engraving brings Sebastião “celestial happiness” shows the extent to which his voice can be heard even as the narrator insists upon his misery and abjection. Although Sebastião’s inner ravings are not always “subversive” vis-à-vis the narrator’s perspective, often working to confirm the discourse of degeneration, this passage, like the ground-floor flat or indeed the narrator’s nausea in telling his tale, does seem to mark a moment in which the doctor bites off a little more than he can eschew.

In Lavois, then, what seem like internal contradictions can, in the main, be conceived as the movements of a marginalising discourse that invests its protagonist with the appearance of agency and subjectivity, paradoxically in an attempt to deny him of this agency by rendering it pathological. Time and again, Sebastião’s transgressive thoughts lend even greater force to the doctor’s subsequent diagnosis. However, the diagnosis does not quite succeed in containing the “contagion”, with various points at which the Baron’s defiance can be heard. The narrative is reminiscent of the frenzied proliferation of deviant categories at the fin de siècle which, as we have seen, left “scientists” with their definitions repeatedly undercut as new ways to be deviant arose once more. The narration of Lavois is no different: the desire to isolate and articulate transgression results in the expression of more perspectives and possibilities than might first have been imagined. At the very least, Botelho depicts something of the dubious freedom in madness.

---

37 Limão de Andrade, p. 32.

O Barão de Lavos and social context: whose “pathology”?

O Barão de Lavos, then, underpinned by degeneration theory, deploys an array of methods to exert power over the sexually “deviant”, although this power seems constantly to be slipping away. The exchange of opposing perspectives reflects the context of acute sexual panic in which the novel was written and the insufficiency of a universalising “science” that fails to circumscribe its object; “nature” can never quite be pinned down. On this note, and before I turn more precisely to the representation of the Portuguese family, I would like to dwell briefly on the novel’s position within the socio-cultural landscape to draw out its dialogue with other discourses from the period. The reference to a number of fin-de-siècle scandals in particular marks a tentative shift in the focus from individual to national pathology, and thus introduces the threat of contagion once more.

As I suggested in the introduction, the arrival of the principles of positivism and degeneration theory in Portugal inf(l)ected the discourse with acutely national concerns. The nation’s extensive imperial losses and the humiliating ultimatum of 1890 seemed to lend historical weight to, for example, theories of the Sotadic zone that cast southern European nations as racially inferior to France and Britain, where these theories were conceived. Indeed, at this point in the century, the notion of Iberian “decadence” and “decay” was well established, introduced earlier by the Geração de ’70 and then widely accepted by the leading intellectuals of the age. Botelho thus echoes others in his recourse to degeneration theory, even when considering more critical (and canonical) voices. As we shall see, the sickly individuals that populate Lisbon at the end of O Crime do Padre Amaro and Os Maias similarly reinforce the perception of a decaying society. Even the nineteenth-century stalwart of Portuguese Romanticism, Camilo Castelo Branco, raises the spectre of degeneration theory in A Brasileira de Prazins (1882), in which the daughters of the disgraced Honorata are regarded by local people as condemned to lunacy and debauchery on account of their transgressive mother and mad grandmother. “Má mulher e mãe de Marta de má árvore, ruim fruto”, ventures Tia Maria de Vilalva. As the popular Portuguese saying dictates, os pecados dos nossos avós fizeram-nos eles, pagamo-los nós. Interestingly, according to the Diário Popular, Camilo also congratulated judge Thomás Ribeiro for using scientific principles to absolve Marinho de Cruz of his crime in 1888. This scandal in particular, which followed those of the Marquês de Valada (1881) and the Rua do Trombeta (1886), added to the panic surrounding the disintegration of the family and empire; Cruz was, after all, a student at the Escola Militar that trained the nation’s (assumedly heterosexual) brothers in arms. All three public scandals appear to have served as an inspiration for Lavos and as a reminder that the “corrupção do século”, along with the “scientific” discourse that scrutinised it, had reached all levels of society.

---

42 I am indebted to Limão de Andrade (p. 13) for this anecdote.

43 Diário Popular, 5th August 1888, Biblioteca Nacional de Portugal.

Further comment is warranted on the Marinho de Cruz case as it is especially revealing of the extent to which positivist and medical discourse had permeated the public sphere. The newspaper coverage of the story is vast and detailed, following the initial trial for weeks on end and, two years later, the retrial in which Marinho de Cruz was convicted, stripping him of his military honours and leading to his imprisonment in front of a huge crowd.44 When the story initially broke on 24th April 1886, the Diário Popular devoted about a third of its total space to the incident. The language used in the newspapers is revealingly similar to that of the narrative voice in Lavos:

N’um caracter tão irregular como o de Marinho da Cruz parece que todos estes factos causaram uma terrível impressão… Havia tempos que o alferes Marinho da Cruz se sentia dominado por alguma idéia sinistra ou por alguma preocupação que não podia vencer. Como em certos casos de loucura o enfermo tem a previsão do acesso proximo, parece que Marinho da Cruz havia tempos que receiava não ter a força de vontade suficiente para resistir a uma tendência funesta.45

The “tendência funesta”, a sense of hereditary inevitability thwarting any attempts at self-control, echoes the narrative inevitability in Lavos five years later. Similarly, the controversy of the initial court case, which as we have seen was one of the first of its kind in acquitting the accused on the grounds of being mentally ill and therefore legally irresponsible, bears the same ideological fault lines as the novel. As one commentator argued on 26th April:

O assassinato perpetrado pelo alferes Marinho da Cruz é um sympthoma funesto de que o positivismo contemporaneo não tem um papel mais efficaz de moralisador do que o anathematisa do sentimentalismo romantico. As circunstancias asquerosas que o precedem e que o revestem estão recommendando este crime à curiosidade doentes dos naturalistas.46

The prosecution, which was largely making the moral argument to push for a prison sentence, reviled the potential for the medicalised, deterministic argument to absolve criminals of all culpability. On the one hand, the scandal was so unpalatable as to require a whole new order of discourse to isolate and describe it. On the other hand, that same discourse deprived the sexually deviant of such a degree of autonomy that they could no longer be held responsible for their actions, affording them, again, the dubious freedom in madness that underscores O Barão de Lavos. In this sense, the problematic debates that simmer in the 1891 novel were widespread through society, from the courtroom to the newspapers and high- and low-brow fiction, and Botelho appears to have drawn upon them considerably. Ironically, even the above commentator who condemns the “curiosidade doentia dos naturalistas” slips into the language of degeneracy in the process, presenting the “crime” as a direct consequence — more, a “sympthoma funesto” — of positivism itself. Sickness, symptoms and “pertubações” were seemingly the order of the day in fin-de-siècle Portugal.

44 Diário de Notícias, 6th September 1888, Biblioteca Nacional de Portugal.

45 Diário Popular, 24th April 1886, Biblioteca Nacional de Portugal.

46 Diário Popular, 24th April 1886, Biblioteca Nacional de Portugal.

The pederastic love triangle: class struggle and the collapse of the Portuguese family

The discourse of degeneracy was thus well diffused throughout Portuguese society, reaching its most powerful, if also contradictory moment when concerned with sexuality. It is no surprise that of Botelho’s series Patologia Social, O Barão de Lavos is the most widely, if not necessarily fondly remembered, being the only instalment to deal primarily with the “vice” of same-sex desire, though the contagion threatens to spill over into the national community as a whole. With this in mind, I would now like to focus more closely on the different amorous attachments in Lavos and, drawing on my assertions in the introduction that the policing of sexuality works to consolidate the accepted structure of kinship and inheritance, assess why they figure as an apparent cause for societal concern. As we shall see, the broken Portuguese family becomes a “symptom” of wider social changes, particularly surrounding class, precipitating a slippage of signifiers from deviant sexuality into a lattice of other transgressions. Once again, the doctor sees his object of study slip between his fingers, and the “pathology” of one individual risks spreading through society in many guises.

Considering that Sebastião’s love for Eugénio is never in fact named as “homossexual”, instead denoted by a host of terms from “inversão sexual” to “pederastia” and “neuropatia”, it is clear that the relationship is non-normative in multifaceted ways and not easily reducible to same-sex desire. Whilst this is inevitably a part, perhaps even the crux of the transgressions, finer tools of analysis are required to capture the wider dynamic of knowledge and power at play. To begin with, the Baron is around twice the age of Eugénio, is the exclusive penetrative partner, and is repeatedly described as a “pederasta” (Limão de Andrade argues that it and “sodomita” are the most insistent terms). He is primarily attracted to adolescent boys, though also to women, again rendering inappropriate the term “homosexual”, which typically denotes exclusive attraction to the same sex. Indeed, the pederastic relationship in \textit{Lavos} is described as heralding from the “efebismo da antiga Grécia” via the Baron’s ancestors (p. 27), and the two other cases of same-sex desire in the novel, involving the Coronel Militião and the black priest, are both pederastic, raising the prospect that Botelho chiefly takes Greek pederasty, and not necessarily contemporaneous studies of the newly invented “homosexuality”, as his paradigm.\footnote{Limão de Andrade, p. 27.} That Sebastião adores his engraving of the Rape of Ganymede, on one occasion justifying homoeroticism based on its prevalence in Ancient Greece, suggests that it is also his guiding star.

47 Botelho’s O Livro da Alda (Porto: Lello, 1982) contains a brief episode of Lesbian desire, but it is not the chief focus of the story.

48 “Ele tinha por enquanto junto do efebo os mesmos apetites de penetração e de posse que o homem sente de ordinário para com a mulher” (p. 92).

If pederasty is the organising principle of Sebastião’s relationship with Eugénio, a host of interrelated practices are uncovered that upset the social order. Greek pederasty was closely associated with pedagogy (indeed, both derive from \textit{paedos}, meaning “boy”). According to Pausanias in Plato’s \textit{Symposium}, two kinds of love derive from Aphrodite, each heralding from different parental lineages ascribed to her in Greek mythology. As daughter of Zeus and Dione, offspring of love between a man and a woman, Aphrodite represents the common love of the body. However, this love is less “pure” than that represented by Aphrodite, daughter of Uranus which, by contrast, is the love of youths, reason and the soul.\footnote{Plato, \textit{Symposium}, translated by Benjamin Jowett (Rockville, Maryland: Serenity Publishers, 2009), p. 52.} Love of youths, therefore, is of a higher order and inseparable from the search for knowledge. The educative aspect of pederasty features prominently in \textit{Lavos}, often subversively, inflecting the central love triangle with class tensions. Indeed, as I will argue, it is as much the class structure as the bourgeois sexual code that is disrupted in \textit{Lavos}: not only does sexual panic readily slip into panic about class, but the former in fact conjures up the latter. The corruption of the family (literally the “família a desfazer-se”) is imagined as the breakdown of patriarchal-capitalist society.

The central love triangle in \textit{Lavos} contains members from each of the three social classes: Sebastião de Noronha, the aristocrat; Elvira, his wife, an “alma lisa de burguesa”; and Eugénio, the working-class orphan who comes to Lisbon in search of a better life. Since the \textit{Guerra dos Dois Irmãos} in the 1830s, the Portuguese aristocracy lost considerable influence, a decline that continued through the decades leading up to the 1908 regicide, in contrast with the correspondingly ascendent bourgeoisie. Accordingly in \textit{Lavos}, with each pillar of society represented, the ensuing affair becomes a miniaturised — allegorical — upheaval of the class structure. At the beginning, the old order remains in place, the Baron seemingly firmly in control of events, bribing Eugénio to accept his advances. Paradoxically, indeed, it is the accumulation of wealth in one family, through generations of (normative) patriarchal marriage, that affords the Baron the privilege to pursue non-normative desires, ultimately leading to the loss of the family fortune. His pederastic desire to educate Eugénio — which also belies a fetishisation of his working-class background —\(^{52}\) gradually lead to the erosion of his powerful position. At first, Sebastião’s financial control over Eugénio allows him to transform the latter into a narcissistic extension of self:

\footnote{Robert Howes also notes that \textit{Lavos} was published at the “mid-point in the development of 19th-century sexology”, and speculates that Botelho owes more to French medical writers such as Charcot, who were “heavily influenced by contemporary theories of degeneration”. See Howes, “Concerning the Eccentricities…”, pp. 38-9.}

D. Sebastião fê-lo vestir e calçar de novo. Ele próprio o acompanhava, no princípio, aos estabelecimentos, onde lhe abriu crédito e onde presidia à escolha dos artigos — tudo do melhor! —, normalizando-lhe o gosto, incutindo-lhe regras de asseio, de apuro, de elegância. O falar ia-lho igualmente corrigindo. Não que o barão não gostasse de ouvir silvar os plebeísmos na boca acerajada do amante. Encantava-o até a propriedade flagrante e o sabor acanalhado de muitas dessas fórmulas da rua, que resumem tanta vez uma filosofia inteira. Mas entrara de flutuar-lhe na alma, inconfessado, tímido, o desejo de se apropriar, de tornar inseparável da sua aquela existência imprescindível... Por isso queria desbastá-lo, afiná-lo, fazê-lo correto, dândi, na previsão de ter de apresentá-lo um dia — que diabo tinha! — às pessoas das suas relações. (p. 99)

The Baron takes evident delight in dressing Eugénio as he pleases, in fancy clothes, so that he might one day be presented to his social circle as a fashionable accessory. Sebastião is not unlike Pygmalion falling in love with his sculpture, a myth that gained renewed popularity in the nineteenth century.\(^{53}\) The phrase “normalizando-lhe o gosto” according to “regras” suggests a correction of taste, reminiscent of the Foucauldian examination, in which disciplinary power is enforced by the regular measuring of subjects according to a norm.\(^{54}\) Furthermore and most symbolically, Sebastião teaches Eugénio to speak the language of his social class, free of slang or “plebeísmos”. As we shall see, the command of language becomes central too in Eugénio’s subsequent affair with Elvira. The Baron’s economic power in the opening chapters allows him to control the \textit{efebo} through his appearance and language, recoding him as a member of his class.

However, as Eugénio accumulates luxurious presents and greater familiarity with high society, he begins to assert greater independence, often ignoring the Baron and missing rendezvous. On one occasion, Eugénio disappears for over twenty-four hours with a younger woman, angering Sebastião. When he seduces Elvira, now dejected and bored to tears, he gains de facto control over the household. Showered with gifts from husband and wife, coming and going to the palacete as he pleases in the knowledge that Sebastião, who in marital acrimony sleeps elsewhere, will not learn of his infidelity, Eugénio extracts every tostão from the family coffers. Just as Sebastião uses his wealth to pursue “deviant” practices, so does Eugénio use deviant practices to accumulate wealth. The ability for these practices to transcend and upset class boundaries was of course crystallised in the Naturalist imagination with works such as Zola’s Nana (1880), in which the protagonist rises from the slums to join the finest society in Paris.\(^{55}\) However, in Lavos, the educative, pederastic relationship results in a particularly intense reversal of fortunes as the pupil goes on to outwit the teacher. At the end, the class inversions reach their conclusion, Sebastião dying destitute on the street at the hands of urchins, and Eugénio found to be a rising star at the Teatro da Trindade, a more reputable venue than the circus, where he proceeds to bankrupt another wealthy aristocrat. In Lavos, the violation of the patriarchal sexual code, which is itself paradoxically facilitated by the great disparities of wealth that it creates and works to sustain, is always imagined as a ruinous space in which class relations are dangerously renegotiated.

In this manner, over the course of her affair with Eugénio, Elvira unwittingly comes to assimilate the efebo’s working-class idiom. Sebastião is shocked to find his wife’s use of vulgar names for coins, such as “camisa lavada”, “coroa mulata” and “penteado” (p. 303). As the narrator continues:

> O caso era que a fraseologia de calão vinha agora aos lábios da baronesa com uma insistência, uma predileção e uma propriedade, que as suas simples relações de sociedade com o efebo não podiam explicar bastantemente. Seria latitudinar [sic] demasiado o instinto da imitação. — Ela como que se revia, se comprazia no termo chulo. A cada instante. Essa vasconça aravia da escumalha parecia ser a que melhor lhe dizia às plebeias condições do temperamento e às tacanhas solicitações do espírito. (p 304)

The “predileção” indicates an unconscious (and therefore more profound) linguistic contagion, whereby terms highly inappropriate for the lar burguês involuntarily find their way into the household, reaching the supposed bastion of bourgeois domestic propriety (and property), the Baroness herself. The neologism “latitudinar” (a broadening, or amplification) is particularly noteworthy, as the narrator appears to require an expanded vocabulary himself to describe the linguistic contagion before him — perhaps another moment where he tastes his own medicine. He appears irritated with Elvira’s obsession with the word “chulo”, suggested by the repetitive syntax in the phrase “como que se revia, se comprazia”. Is the doctor losing his empirical cool? That “chulo” is Elvira’s slang word of choice, meanwhile — meaning both something vulgar and an “indivíduo que se aproveita de alguém e vive à sua custa” — is interesting in itself. Elvira does not appear to notice that her lover is in fact the “chulo”, and that she is supporting his lifestyle. As she assimilates Eugénio’s speech (described remarkably as Basque-Arab-like nonsense from the dregs of society) she takes on more than she can handle, foreshadowing the impending catastrophe, this linguistic contagion accompanying the process by which Eugénio seizes control of the bourgeois sphere. It should be stressed that Elvira’s relationship with Eugénio is highly non-normative in itself. The scandalous age difference between the trintona Baroness and the teenage boy, coupled with the adultery and obvious class disparities, whereby Elvira pays to keep Eugénio as a lover, make the amorous attachment variously antithetical to the bourgeois patriarchal model. That Eugénio’s language, having once been “corrected” by Sebastião, has now, in symmetrical fashion, returned to “corrupt” the heart of the household, testifies to growing power of the working-class efebo, an inversion of fortunes brought about by his dismantling of the normative sexual code.

---

Sebastião and Elvira’s marriage, as a consequence of Eugénio’s “intrusion”, and although founded on a degree of mutual affection at the start, steadily falls to pieces. Elvira, whose great expectations for her future with the Baron are shattered as he spends ever less time at home, begins to rebel. Already in chapter III, the Baron’s patronising tone after refusing to accompany her on an outing provoke a defiant response:

— Supões-me mais idiota do que sou.
— Ó filha, não é isso! — afagou o barão com a mais afetuosa bonomia. […]
— Bem! não faltava mais nada. Agora chamas-me criança! — explodiu ela com vivacidade, enquanto arrastava para longe, num sacão de arremesso, a chávena de cujo chá bebia os últimos goles.

Desta vez o barão, posto em prova, afastou da mesa o tronco, alto e direito, e cravou na mulher um severo olhar de reprimenda. Mas ela, de cotovelo fincado sobre a toalha, franzir desdenhoso nos lábios, a mão cocegando a ponta da barba num jeitinho impertinente e raivoso, pôs-se a fitar com altiva insolência uma das rosetas do teto e a fustigar o parquet num bater de pé provocante. Uma trepidação elástica e felina corria-lhe o colo, os seios e a face rija e redonda, em cujas vénulas engrossadas se via a fremer e a subir um sangue roxo, irritado.

De repente, abate sobre o marido as pupilas, crispantes de desafio:
— Preciso sair hoje… Não me acompanhas?

---

57 “Double Dutch” might be offered as a translation of “vasconça”, but the bizarre addition of “aravia” emphasises even further the foreignness (and heresy?) of Elvira’s speech vis-à-vis the bourgeois reader. As Susan Sontag notes, disease is often articulated as a foreign problem (hence the English describing syphilis as “French pox”). See Sontag, p. 48.
— Logo vil... ou eu não tivesse que fazer!... — respondeu com impeto o barão.
— Que marido tão condescendente, tão amável que eu tenho, Santo Deus!... Nem de encomenda! — E depois de uma pausa, numa irritação crescente: — Para que me foi tirar a casa dos meus pais? (p. 40-1)

Sebastião, treating his wife like a daughter and with no regard for her needs and desires, finds his (patriarchal) authority suddenly threatened as she questions his decision to marry her. Her gesture of indifference, resting her head on her elbow, and looking at the roses on the ceiling, foreshadows her future “misbehaviour” and adulterous relationship with Eugénio that sees her cuckold her husband and steal his lover in the same move:

Porque no [...] espírito [do barão] a noção da mulher, da esposa desaparecera, para só ver nela, em rodilhões de ciúme, um trambolho, um rival, um estorvo odiado, um empecilho irritante, um competidor terrível, que assim vinha, traiçoeiro e impudente, tomar-lhe o passo — com que direito? — roubar-lhe o amor do efebo — que era só dele! — destorvá-lo, desbancá-lo, atravessar-se... impedir a sua regalada e solta fruição da vida! (p. 307)

Elvira has remarkably become not only a “rival”, but is repeatedly articulated grammatically in the masculine, with a lengthy display asyndeton that suggests the Baron’s shock as much as it does Elvira’s seeming power. Botelho radically reassembles the nineteenth-century love triangle such that Sebastião is “cuckolded” twice over by his wife and lover. The “classic” nineteenth-century love triangle, as discussed in René Girard’s Deceit, Desire and the Novel, establishes a bond of rivalry between two men, which Eve Sedgwick analyses as “homosocial”, being disrupted by the denial of any potential for homoerotic desire. The effect was to maintain the position of women as “currency” in the (re)production of heirs to transmit name, capital and bloodline. In Lavos, by contrast, the violation of normative heterosexuality allows the triangle to do the full loop, Elvira being not only seduced by another man (worse, a boy), but taking her husband’s lover in the same move, elevating her to the status of (masculine) rival. The repositioning of the woman in this manner constitutes another slippage of signifiers, this time of deviant sexuality into gender trouble and the resultant marital breakdown, participating, perhaps, in contemporaneous fears about the increasing economic empowerment of women.

In Lavos, therefore, the patriarchal family, consolidated through heterosexual marriage and a privileged male space of brotherly rivalry, is turned on its head, signalling, too, an inversion of economic bonds in society. As Howes comments in reference to Eugénio’s ruinous appearance in the Baron’s domestic life, “[h]omosexuality is seen as a threat to the family, and in particular the family as incarnation of property.”

Paradoxically, however, it is precisely property that facilitates the pursuit of “homosexuality” in the novel, another moment where the dominant ideology is implicated in the very “symptom” that it sets out to cure. Meanwhile, Botelho’s recourse to Greek pederasty invests deviant sexuality with class tensions, and the pressure it exerts on the Baron’s marriage allows anxiety about changing gender roles to flourish. The impossibility of isolating (homo)sexuality as a category of deviance allows other transgressions to creep into the picture, such as prostitution, adultery, and class and gender trouble. By decentering sexuality as the sine qua non site of deviance, its interactions with other threats to bourgeois morality allow the reader to apprehend the wider contagion released into society, prising open the doctor’s flood gates that seek to protect the “natural” family from its “unnatural” counterpart.

Para fora do sórdido armário: opening the urban closet

Since the violation of the heteronormative imperative in Lavos inevitably uncovers other tensions surrounding race, gender and class, it seems pertinent to include an analysis of the urban environment in the novel, a space that becomes gradually more chaotic as the scandal unfolds, and that again leads to moments in which the “contagion” escapes the cure. Urbanisation in the nineteenth century changed the face of cities beyond recognition: Lisbon’s population more than doubled between 1849 and 1900, giving rise to several unprecedented urban projects, most famously the Avenida da Liberdade, which supplanted the old Passeio Público. The novel has already been identified by critics as illuminative of queer life in fin-de-siècle Lisbon; Howes ventures that Botelho develops a tension between the “sanctity and security” of the Baron’s house and the “social and sexual promiscuity” of the street, whose boundaries become porous as the Baron introduces the efebo into his home. I will largely depart from this insight, arguing that an initially divided and hierarchical city, in which bourgeois lisboetas are shielded from the realities of working-class life, falls into disarray, with an epidemic of disease, sexual deviance, criminality and prostitution — all facets of the same “degenerate” peril — spreading through society. In a sense, the chaos resembles an urban “closet”, or series of closets, being opened. Eve Sedgwick defines the closet as “the relations of the known and the unknown, the explicit and the inexplicit around the homo/heterosexual definition”.

60 Howes, “Concerning the Eccentricities…”, p. 40.

Given the lack of established homo/heterosexual binary at the fin de siècle and, on the contrary, the slippage of deviant sexuality into other signifiers of deviance, I will be using Sedgwick’s model to describe a range of transgressive practices that seem to coalesce around the undoing of the normative family. These practices can be considered initially “closeted” in the sense that they are contained within the urban environment, far from the respected families of the bourgeoisie, being slowly released into the wider world as the Baron’s secret is divulged. The resulting class and sexual turmoil in the capital of the empire, Lisbon, which in the language of pathology figures as a public health problem, further threatens the supremacy of the doctor’s perspective.

Already at the beginning of the novel, urban spaces of ambiguous meaning serve as a harbinger of what follows. Botelho sets the opening chapter in the circus on the Rua do Salitre, a road linking upper-class Rato to the newly-built Avenida da Liberdade, where Sebastião cruises for adolescent boys. The circus, although not an invention of the nineteenth century, witnessed a huge surge in popularity in the 1800s, and represents the triumph of the new social classes, from the working class to the petit-bourgeois. Furthermore, as Howes notes, the circus in Lavos recalls one of the acrobat boys involved in the Rua do Trombeta scandal. It is also the site of corporeal spectacle par excellence, not only prefiguring the series of social performances that the Baron will be coerced into to fasten the closet doors, but also calling to mind the bodily “aberrations” of the freak shows that typically featured at the nineteenth-century circus, gaining enormous popularity in the fin de siècle, age of the Elephant Man and the “original” Siamese twins. As Alston and Dixon argue, the controlled exhibition of the exotic at the circus serves to regulate the seductive temptation of the other, thus reflecting a growing, if implicit tension between bourgeois ideology and the new elements of society that at once generated fear and fascination. In this way, the beginning of the novel sits at the point of conflict between the new and the old, the permitted and the prohibited, the known and the unknown, the “normal” and the “deviant”; indeed, a whole array of divisions and exclusions that, in their regulated showcasing, serve to consolidate bourgeois identity at the same time that the need to contain and police them already implies that this identity is in potential danger. The ambivalent space of the circus thus introduces the fault lines in the social fabric that will gradually open as the novel — and illicit affairs — progress.

For a time after the ominous opening, the Baron’s affair is strictly closeted. The Baron’s ancestral palacete is located on the Largo de São Cristóvão, one of the oldest and most noble centres of the city. Lavishly decorated and with panoramic views over Lisbon, it is here that he lives with his wife and entertains his guests. However, he enacts his affair with Eugénio in his apartment on the Rua da Rosa, Bairro Alto, a notorious neighbourhood of fishwives, “vice” and prostitution, described by the narrator as filled with “haréns carimbados” and other “tortuosidades” (p. 283). The Bairro Alto was also where the Marquês de Valada was caught with a soldier in 1881, on the nearby Travessa da Espera, suggesting again the influence of contemporary events. The dingy apartment has the purpose of “closeting” the Baron’s deviant relationship with Eugénio. At this point, “queer” practices remain confined to the private sphere, to a particular part of the city, far from the bourgeoisie, giving rise to two conflicting spaces that Sebastião moves between perhaps precariously, but so far unheeded since the polarised urban environment aids his secret double life. In this sense, I disagree with Howes’ suggestion that the clandestine apartment is something of a “half-way house between the illicit sexuality of the street and the world of domestic respectability”. It is, rather, the closeting of illicit sexuality, a testimony to its shame, and perhaps even less morally ambiguous than the subversive ambiguity of the street or circus.

---

It is only when Sebastião decides to introduce Eugénio to life at the palacete that the closet doors begin to open. Dressed as a dandy and now “muito bem ensaiado”, Eugénio has the veneer of refinement whilst fulfilling perfectly the degeneration theorists’ conviction that nurture could only go so far towards altering nature. He is stunned at the luxury of the Baron’s household upon his first visit:

Eugénio pasmava, considerava com um espanto que era quase desconfiança aquela colónia de maravilhas. Ele não lhes media o valor; não podia sentir o que havia de superiormente belo, de fascinador, de requintadamente bom e confortante naquele entesourar de raridades, naquele ardente rebuscar de harmonias plásticas, naquela seleção de cores, naquela coabitação de obras primas. A voluptuosidade artística não a tinha; não lhe davam para isso a grosseria do temperamento nem os rudimentos da educação: mas uma noção vaga de prazer e de respeito fazia-o aplaudir. (p. 162)

Eugénio’s “grosseria do temperamento” renders the luxury of the palacete entirely other to him, so much so that he contemplates the strangely exoticised “colónia de maravilhas” with distrust. Thus whilst Sebastião’s privilege affords him free and secret passage between spheres, giving substance to the public fascination with aristocrats living Jekyll-and-Hyde double lives, Eugénio’s access to privilege remains regulated by the Baron. Merely masquerading as a member of high society, he cannot lead a true double life but must assimilate and simulate upper-class behaviour, setting the stage for the series of “contagions” that ensue upon his arrival in the domestic sphere: a wolf disguised as grandma, but a wolf nevertheless. Indeed, the mask slips on Eugénio’s first visit, with his rehearsed praise for the “café magnifico” becoming quickly embarrassing as he compares it to the coffee of an establishment named “O Refilão” (159). The Baroness, in shock, replies, “O Refilão!… Que vem a ser?” The word is something of a shibboleth, described by Derrida as that which both includes and excludes, a “password, a mark of belonging”

---

70 (or not-belonging) allowing us to “recognize and be recognized by one’s own, for better or for worse.”

71 Indeed, Elvira later muses, “Era esquisito!… Como podia um rapaz inteligente e educado, como este era sem dúvida, falar daquele modo?… Ou não era realmente inteligente, ou era muitíssimo grosseiro, ou tivera uma péssima educação” (p. 170). She evidently perceives the incommensurability of his language and etiquette, although it is not enough to prevent her from assimilating his idiom later in the novel. On the contrary, the inability to tame Eugénio’s apparently “incorrigible” working-class “nature” implies that it will always return to exert a threatening influence: his “colonisation” of the heartlands of the bourgeoisie can only be imagined as troublesome. His very language, branded improper, in fact disarticulates the normative speech of the upper classes. If the circus functions as a space in which relations with the exotic can be sold, consumed and regulated, working to suppress any degree of reciprocity, Eugénio’s appearance in the family home as a working-class imposter testifies to the unpredictability and “danger” of the encounter with the other that arises when two separate, strictly policed spheres come into contact.

It is, indeed, the Baron’s decision to introduce Eugénio into his home and the public sphere, and not the relationship per se, that brings about the unravelling of his precarious life. Once Eugénio’s assimilation of bourgeois culture allows him to exploit the situation and destroy the family home, culminating in its mortgage and sale, Sebastião is forced to renounce his double life for a lower social status in order to pursue his “deviant” life. This process spreads the contagion, formally limited to the family home, to the remainder of the city. He invests in a disreputable atelier producing pornographic photographs of models, these chiefly adolescent boys whom he finds “pelos vários cantos de miséria e crápua da cidade” and then brings to the atelier, situated deliberately in Bairro Alto for its position as a “ponto central da cidade” (363-5). The subsequent horror of the passing bourgeois families is described in detail:

De sorte que então aconteceu, não raro, uma ou outra família burguesa defrontar, horrorizada, na galeria, no toilette, na sala de espera, com vultos suspeitos de mulheres de xale e lenço, carmim na face e saia engomada, as quais se enrolavam nos fauteuils, dê cabeça baixa, como gatas, ou, tapando o rosto, cosiam-se com os cantos. E aqui e ali, a esmo, cuias, andrajos,

The nauseating smell and greasy accessories add to the sense of a sickness brought to the city centre, while the asyndeton evokes bustle and chaos. Eventually, a sex scandal engulfs the establishment, reaching the papers, involving “os mais graúdos frascários da arte e da finança” (p. 368), and the atelier is shunned, debt-ridden and forced to close. Sebastião’s financial situation worsens further, his reputation all but destroyed. As he is “outed”, the “closeted” areas of the city become increasingly visible. Rather fittingly, this social and urban disturbance is brought about by a photography business. As Elizabeth Stephens argues, the photograph, after its invention and popularisation in the nineteenth century, constituted:

> a new technology that both reflected and participated in the rapidly changing assumptions about the nature and purpose of the body… [understood as] a pure and unmediated form of representation, promising to make visible the “reality” of the body.72

Seen in this context, the atelier becomes all the more scandalous, documenting and flaunting the bodies of individuals paid to strip naked for a photograph, providing “proof” of homoerotic desires in the heart of the city with the privileged authority of the new technology. Here one wonders, however, whether the doctor is again administered a dose of his own medicine, since the Baron’s supposedly perverse, “scandalous” new technology seems uncomfortably close to the narrative technique that promises to articulate his pathological “truth”. Either way, just as the novelty of photography and pathology seemed to contribute to their authority, here they also reinforce the sense that class and sexual turmoil are a modern, and thus more urgent problem.

After the disaster of the atelier, the dramatic reversal of class roles in Lavos concludes with Sebastião taking up life in some of the most disreputable areas of the city. Though it should be stressed once more that, to some extent, Sebastião chooses to renounce the upper-class sphere, refusing the offer of a noble salon in his friend’s home, he does so to maximise his sexual freedom, confirming the sense that sexual deviance can only, in the end, be accommodated in the abject corners of the urban environment, if not quite in the attic, avoided by the bourgeoisie although now made visible by the “perverse” narration, the photographs, the new avenues; in short, by modernisation. The Baron’s decision to occupy the cramped basement is also a resignation to losing the privilege of moving between social strata, being confined instead to the lowest. From hereon in, his body carries myriad markers of “deviance”. No longer cruising the circus to pay for sex, he wanders the most notorious alleyways in the city, Calçada do Garcia and Beco do Forno, behind Rossio square:

---

Aí, no mistério dos antros defumados a alfazema e candeias de petróleo, o sinistro andromaníaco sofria os mais aviltadores exercícios, prestava-se às mais secretas exações, às mais infames promiscuidades. E assim, nesta vesânia circular em volta às mesmas abjeções e aos mesmos vícios, teimava esbodegando a dignidade e a vida — amarrado agora à cancela das casas suspeitas, logo rompendo a tragar mais uma gota de vitríolo na última baiuca ainda aberta, espojado depois nas enxergas dos alcouces — pelos ínfimos bosteiros da cidade solto e doido completando o ciclo prostibular do seu destino. (p. 397)

Sebastião seems to blend into his environment, merely another incidence of “sickness”, decay and vice that is doomed by “nature” to extinction. Interestingly, he forms part of the “mistério” of this part of the city (from Latin mysterium, meaning something secret)\(^{73}\) as though he and his surroundings somehow escape signification — particularly fitting for a narrative object that can never quite be brought under control. Is the doctor acknowledging limits in his knowledge? The term “andromaníaco” is a “scientific” term that seems to reassert medical representation, but it is noteworthy that the doctor then segues to the Baron’s alcoholism: defining “andromania” results in a slippage into other non-normative “symptoms”. Meanwhile, “antros” connotes an (atavistic) regression to the state of nature, the primitive darkness of the cave. The Baron’s apparent transition from being an active to a passive sexual partner here, becoming himself a prostitute apparently in the process, inverts the state of affairs at the beginning of the novel, where he assumes the other side of the transaction. His life is described as “vagabundagem” (like the circus workers he once paid for sex with, perhaps?), and he is driven to theft, including from his old friends, the Paradelas. Crime, sexual deviance, vice, prostitution and illness seamlessly overlap, both in the characterisation of the Baron and of the area of the city to which he is confined.

Even when with the Paradelas, the only friends of the Baron who still invite him to their house, his difference from them is made abundantly clear. The virginal “filhita” of the family is physically disgusted by his presence:

> Natural que à filhita dos Paradelas a presença do barão não agradasse. Nutria por ele uma invencível repulsão física; arrepiava-a de nojo e de terror aquela afrontosa e senil leprósidade. Inelutavelmente. Ele a entrar e ela a sair das salas... não lhe estendia a mão, quase não lhe falava. Poderia alguma vez, por caridade, querer ser benévola com o hóspede, mas não o conseguia. Era uma repugnância absoluta, essencial, inteiramente rebelde ao domínio da vontade. (p. 402)

---

In the encounter between the Baron and the Paradelas’ daughter, the closet doors are fully unhinged for all the “sordid” contents to be seen. Whereas once the two had conversed as equals, free of suspicions surrounding the Baron’s sexuality, his unspeakable secret is now visible and inscribed onto his body in the form of disease and poverty. His sexual “disease” figures as “senil leprosidade”, leprosy being not only a Biblical curse⁷⁴ but also, for Foucault, the original “othering” sickness that provided the model for modern psychiatry.⁷⁵ Interestingly in Lavos, the “psychiatric” discourse of “andromania” gets re-inscribed (atavistically?) as the “original” malady, branding Sebastião as cursed — remarkably metaphysical terms, perhaps, for a practising doctor to employ. Perennially excluded from the bourgeois sphere, the Baron owes any contact with his former friends to charity, with the Paradelas, for example, deliberately leaving a coin for him to “pinch” upon entry. Indeed, when once the Baron crossed urban spheres effortlessly, moving between his palacete and the Rua da Rosa, now his visit to the Paradelas, strictly at their invitation, only confirms his position as debarred from the bourgeois world and all its privileges, not least the coveted attention of its young brides-to-be. For the virgin brides, of course, form one half of the bourgeois kinship arrangement that has now been irredeemably violated.

However, as we have seen, the narrative of Lavos never keeps the closet doors open to the bourgeoisie for long. The doctor’s voice returns to pathologise and purge “deviant” behaviour, and at this stage in the “epidemic”, the only fate that can restore the cordon sanitaire is the Baron’s death, eliminating the “contagion” from the city. The closing lines of the novel, in which his corpse is found by a policeman, remove Sebastião from the social order:

Lobrigando o velho estendido, foi um polícia acudir. Empurra com o pé, brada, ameaça. Por fim, perante aquela absoluta imobilidade, sério, debruçou-se. — As duas pernas e um braço, partidos... o negro charco em que a face nadava, não era vinho, era sangue. — Imaginara um bêbado, defrontou um cadáver. (p. 415)

The switching of perspective to that of an anonymous policeman has the effect of depriving Sebastião of his name and identity, which the unusual verb “lobrigando”, to see obscurely, fades into the surroundings. Sebastião becomes a faceless “cadáver”, steeped in blood for gory effect. Furthermore, the appearance of the policeman, who now finds and “diagnoses” the Baron himself, demonstrates the complicity of medical and criminal discourses that together create and remove “deviance” to establish the dominance of a norm: the doctor’s gaze is seamlessly exchanged for that of the policeman. Desire becomes disease; disease becomes poverty; poverty becomes crime; all these lead to death. With renewed confidence in the ability of the positivist disciplines to treat “deviant” behaviour, illustrated by the policeman’s examination of the Baron’s body, the bourgeois reader ought at last to rest assured that their world has been saved. Interestingly, the policeman first appears to see wine before perceiving it to be blood. Is this another Biblical reference, in which an unholy sacrament comes horribly to fruition? There is the suggestion that Baron’s death is sacrificial, purging the world of its sins, these now reimagined as sicknesses that can be “treated” to cleanse the bourgeoisie.

⁷⁴ In the second Book of Kings, Elisha curses Gehazi with Naaman’s leprosy as a punishment for abusing his authority. “Naaman’s leprosy will cling to you and to your descendants forever.” 2 Kings 5: 27.

Botelho’s choice of location for Sebatião’s death provides a final twist to sweeten the bourgeois reader. Sebastião dies at the hands of street urchins on the Avenida da Liberdade, the new avenue supplanting the old Passeio Público, built in Parisian style, and amid much controversy, between 1879 and 1886. The Avenida was a triumph of Liberalism in Portugal, reminiscent of Haussmann’s regeneration of Paris and bringing a new artery of commerce and luxury housing to the centre of Lisbon. In Lavos, the last representative of one of the oldest houses in the country thus dies in one of its newest places, and indeed precisely the place that epitomises the ascendance of middle class lisboetas. Mercilessly beaten by street urchins and left to die on the altar of the bourgeoisie, Sebastião, in his final moments, also breathes the last dying breaths of his entire social class, an ancient aristocracy crumbling under the great urbanisation and mercantilisation of the nineteenth century. Just seventeen years after the publication of Lavos, Dom Carlos I of Portugal was assassinated in Terreiro do Paço, ushering in the nation’s precarious First Republic. The chief beneficiary of this century of transformations was, of course, the bourgeoisie, and the sense of societal “cure” following Sebastião’s death in the novel was thus surely all the more keenly felt by a middle-class readership that was, in general, quietly willing to observe the decline of the old nobility. No doubt this comforting ending to a sensationalist text in part led to widespread criticism, at the time of the novel’s publication, that Botelho was chiefly writing for money. Certainly, he speaks chiefly to and for the dominant classes, naturalising their ideology with “science”. That said, the working classes (represented by Eugénio) do appear to be going places at the end of the novel; there is no static resolution to the bourgeois ascendency, just as its justification in “science” seems slippery throughout, occasionally capturing its own “perversion” in a lewd photograph.

Analysing the configuration of urban space in the novel, therefore, besides revealing much about sexual life in fin-de-siècle Lisbon, helps us to position it within the class structure of the period, as well as pick apart the cordon sanitaire with which it seeks to excite, delight and, occasionally, terrify its bourgeois readership. The gradual spread of the “sickness” through an initially segregated city is witnessed through the lens of a new “science” of pathology and criminology, eventually handing victory to the bourgeoisie as the aristocracy suffers a terminal diagnosis. However, although Botelho provides the reader with the illusion of good health in the midst of the epidemic, there are moments in which the cure fails and the contagion, like the Baron’s agency, escapes unscathed. These moments, such as the mysterious appearance of the city’s dark cruising grounds, or the reinscription of illness as curse, curiously write against nature, in that they gesture towards insufficiencies in the naturalising framework when contemplating the undoing of the normative family. As we shall see, it is a process that is echoed in the novel’s remarkable use of allegory.

---

77 Howes, “Concerning the Eccentricities…”, p. 33.

Allegories against nature: Dom Sebastião, kinship trouble and the end of empire

For scholars seeking to address the role heteronormativity has played in Portuguese history, the figure of Dom Sebastião (1554-1578) has presented a particular draw: a boy king who inherited the world’s most powerful throne, but whose failure to leave an heir, sparking rumours of homosexuality, brought Portugal under the crown of Castile after his disappearance in the disastrous battle of Alcáçer-Quibir. That his body was never found led to a widespread belief that he would yet return to restore the Portuguese empire, so much so that various false pretenders appeared in years following, and an island in Maranhão was specifically designated for his use in case of shipwreck. An occasionally fierce debate has arisen surrounding the king’s alleged homosexuality, much of which revolves around contemporary assertions that “elRey de nenhuma maneira pode ver molher [sic]”, though Johnson finds further evidence that the king sought illicit encounters near his palace in Sintra. Although I have no desire to wade into the historical debate, I do find the speculation significant, not least since it has a long history, as the characterisation of Sebastião in Lavos suggests. In Botelho’s novel, clear parallels are developed between the protagonist and the king, adding an allegorical dimension to the novel that serves to inflect the pathological discourse with national concerns. However, as we shall see, although there is a movement towards naturalising the nation’s ills, there is also a disruptive countermovement, since the recourse to allegory marks a definitive departure from the pathological method.

---

Botelho’s reference to the “failed” Portuguese monarch, besides the naming of his protagonist, is carefully constructed. As in the sixteenth century, the destruction of an ancient household follows the violation of the patriarchal code demanding normative heterosexuality and the need for progeny to perpetuate name, bloodline and property. The Baron, whose lineage, “duplamente bastarda” (p. 23), is meticulously traced from the illegitimate children of the Portuguese and Spanish royalty, already carries the atavistic blood that mixes pederasty and the corruption of family lines with the pernicious approximation of Portugal and Spain. Like the king, too, Sebastião dies physically on the new frontier of the Empire, alone and unidentified, having turned his back on home, bringing an end to his ancient lineage and leaving the future of the nation in doubt. The pathological language strengthens the sense that the Baron is at least an atavistic, if not necessarily messianic revenant of the king: a regression, a compulsion to repeat a much older national trauma. Lavos’ curious allegorisation of the Baron’s plight as an experience of Portuguese nationhood, of course, comes just a year after the British ultimatum that all but destroyed the monarchy’s reputation.

Indeed, it in the figure of Dom Sebastião that the discourse of degeneracy reaches a national pitch that blends novelistic fatality with the end of empire. The pathological inevitability of Sebastião’s death also signals, when associated with the sixteenth-century monarch, the inexorability and inevitability of Portuguese imperial decline. The doctor’s voice comes to confirm the diagnosis of such public intellectuals as Oliveira Martins who, in accordance with the tenets of northern European degeneration theory, prophesied the slow extinction of Portugal and other “lesser” races. Conversely, Portuguese imperial decline is also used to confirm degeneration theory in the novel, a complicity of history and theory that invests deviant desire and kinship trouble with that greatest of horrors, national apocalypse. The result is an alarming cultural pessimism in Lavos that seemingly embraces the theories of northern Europe, catastrophic as they were for countries such as Portugal, adding pathological substance to the perception that the nation was in decline due to its “degenerate” sons and daughters. Indeed, the allegorical leap from individual to national degeneracy once again casts sexual panic as a racial problem in an apparent indictment of Portuguese blood. Thus although the bourgeois reader is saved from immediate “infection” when Sebastião dies, more pervasive questions about the future “viability” of the nation and its bloodline remain unanswered. Dom Sebastião returns as the myth promises, but instead of restoring imperial greatness, he is atavistically compelled to repeat the “mistakes” of the past.

Botelho’s naturalisation of Portuguese imperial “decline” in his novel, then, surprisingly reintroduces the risk of contagion to the bourgeoisie that elsewhere he seeks to protect. However, his recourse to allegory in the process constitutes a particularly intriguing structural decision, since although there are many moments elsewhere in the novel where the theory encounters its own limits, here, the doctor seeks a different register. Allegory, indeed, stands strikingly at odds with the fundamentals of the Naturalist method. Characterised by Paul de Man as a dialectical movement between symbol and allegory, each producing the other’s meaning in the absence of any “asserted superiority” of one over the other, the technique mystifies that layer of meaning that in the Naturalist model, as explored so compellingly by Barthes, is designed to denote reality itself. The spectre of Dom Sebastião returns to pressure the representation of an individual “pathology” by subtly reinstating it as a national “disease”. Here, surely, the novel reveals its place in the literary space of the Western world at the time. So pathologised was the nation of study in contemporary discourses that Botelho could conflate “degenerate” individual and nation in allegory, a move that constitutes an unexpected supplement to the arrival of literary pathology in Portugal and which, although used to confirm the imported theories, also quietly writes against their method by introducing another, more figurative field of meaning and interpretation. It is a technique repeated, as we shall see, in the work of the other authors considered in this thesis.

82 Concerning the Baron’s sixth great-grandfather: “O atavismo fez explodir neste com râbida energia todos os vícios constitucionais que bacilavam no sangue da sua raça, exagerados numa confluência de seis gerações, de envolta com instintos doidos de pederasta, inoculados e progressivamente agravados na sociedade portuguesa pelo modalismo etnológico da sua formação” (p. 26).

Conclusions

With its erratic narrative, tortured contradictions and fatalistic plot, O Barão de Lavos bears all the fault lines of fin-de-siècle discourse, testifying to an age of profound social unease. As fascinated by deviant desire as it is horrified, the narration deploys degeneration theory to isolate and remove the “diseased”, only to produce their “pathology” in the process. The attempt to represent desire as disease plays out the proliferation of fin-de-siècle epistemological categories in fictional form. Thus the attempt to isolate sexuality as a site of “deviance” precipitates a slippage into other signifiers associated with gender, class, race and illness. The central pederastic relationship in particular, with its educational imbalance, sets the stage for a reversal of class and gender roles that accompanies the violation of the patriarchal code. Meanwhile, as city and domestic sphere are ripped apart by the “epidemic”, encompassing crime and poverty, licentiousness and disease, all imagined as part of the same malady, the focus shifts from “deviant” desire to the worrying state of the nation, mired in the social upheavals of the century. And although the Baron’s death surely testifies to the demise of the aristocracy in Portugal — to the perverse delight, no doubt, of a comforted bourgeois readership — his resemblance to Dom Sebastião belies an extreme cultural pessimism that no citizen can easily ignore.

---

The bleak implications of Lavos testify to the disturbing extent to which degeneration theory had circulated in Portugal and Europe as a “natural” explanation for what were little more than economic disparities. Botelho’s perpetual attempts to isolate deviance in physi(olog)ical phenomena lead to the grounding of Portuguese imperial decline in its “degenerate” bloodline; cultural despondency is translated into racial inevitability. It would take more critical voices than Abel Botelho, as we shall see in the case of Eça de Queirós in the following chapter, to challenge the principles of the new “sciences” and explore kinship trouble as a potential site for national renewal. Nevertheless, against all the odds, Botelho does write “against nature” at times; the contagion is never adequately contained, mysterious limits emerge in the medical gaze, and the doctor sometimes catches his patient’s “disease”. Most remarkably, his use of allegory supplements and distorts the Naturalist model as conceived in centres of dominance, pressuring the “reality effect” to conflate individual and national “pathology”. Is Lavos, to return to Howes’ words, “fatal flawed”? If so, its fatality is also remarkably creative, its obsession with degeneracy surprisingly generative. Its paroxysm of neologisms and shrewd, if slippery use of metaphor warrant a level of close reading that critics have generally been unwilling to engage with, and the novel should at least be brought back from the brink of canonical oblivion for the insights it offers into the fin-de-siècle world, both in Portugal and beyond. Indeed, despite its overwhelmingly moralising-medicalising tone, there are many moments in which the reader glimpses an alternate morality — and even epistemology — to the one that defines the narration. This, surely, is the “corrupção do século” that the doctor seems to condemn throughout, but which he is, no less, determined to contemplate.
Chapter II: Eça de Queirós

Introduction

— Vem tu cá abaixo! Posso perfeitamente conversar na água!

[Reinaldo] saiu, berrando por William, o seu criado inglês.

Quando Basílio desceu ao banho, Reinaldo estirado com voluptuosidade na tina, donde saía um forte cheiro de água de Lubin, exclamou, deleitando-se no seu conforto:

— Então cartinha apanhada nos papéis sujos!
— Não, Reinaldo, mas francamente estou embaraçado. Que achas tu que eu faça?
— As malas, menino!

E sentado na tina, ensaboando devagar o seu corpo magro:

— Aí está o que é fazer amor às primas da Patriarchal Queimada!
— Oh! — fez Basílio, impaciente.
— Oh, quê? — E, coberto de flocos de espuma, com as mãos apoiadas ao rebordo de mármore na tina: — Pois tu achas isso decente […] Uma mulher que, como tu mesmo disseste, usa meias de tear!

[…]

Basílio deu logo provas: descreveu belezas do corpo da Luísa; citou episódios lascivos.

O tecto e os tabiques envernizados de branco reflectiam a luz, com tons macios de leite; a exalação da água tépida aumentava o calor morno; e um cheiro fresco de sabão e água de Lubin adoçava o ar. […]

E tomando a esponja, [Reinaldo] deixava cair grandes golpes de água pela cabeça, pelos ombros, soprando, regalado na frescura aromática. […]

— E partimos amanhã? — gritou Reinaldo.
— Amanhã.
— Por Madrid?
Por Madrid.
— Salero! — Pôs-se de pé, na tina, entusiasmado…¹

¹ Eça de Queirós, O primo Basílio, intro. by Maria Tarracha Ferreira (Lisbon: Ulisseia, 2002), p. 253. All page references are to this edition.
In this extraordinary passage from O primo Basílio (1878), two long-standing companions, Basílio and Reinaldo, converse while the latter lies (and later stands) naked in the bathtub. As Reinaldo rubs soap and water over his body, covered in flecks of foam, the pair discuss their travelling plans and love interests. The conversation, which restricts bawdy talk to women alone, makes for exemplary homosocial camaraderie. However, to the reader — or at least this reader — the scene exudes a homoerotic excess that undermines the pair’s efforts to contain it. The rhythmic asyndeton of “pela cabeça, pelos ombros” deflects our attention, like the water, onto Reinaldo’s naked body. And yet Basílio’s attention seems to be elsewhere. Indeed, put more accurately, the scene exudes both eroticism and its conspicuous absence, leaving the quality of the friends’ desire fundamentally indeterminate. Eça leaves open a series of questions that Botelho, in O Barão de Lavos, restlessly seeks to answer: what is “erotic” desire, when is it perceived as such by others and, lastly, where do the limits of the “normal” and accepted lie? How and why Eça poses these questions will be one of the central concerns of the present chapter.

To consider the work of Eça de Queirós after O Barão de Lavos, of course, is to move from the periphery to the centre of the Portuguese literary canon. Eça is one of the most widely read and studied of all Lusophone authors, one whose works have gained international recognition through translations into such diverse languages as Russian, Chinese, and Thai. Harold Bloom includes Os Maias in his Western Canon, and Émile Zola himself referred to Eça as “far greater than my own dear master, Flaubert”. However, despite his centrality in the Lusophone canon, being perhaps the only Naturalist to occupy this privileged patriarchal space of fathers and masters, Eça nevertheless wrote from the periphery of the Naturalist tradition. As Silviano Santiago argues, works such as O primo Basílio, which was accused at the time of being a plagiarism of Madame Bovary, actively engage with the expectation of marginal cultures to borrow from centres of dominance. Eça was acutely aware of the Portuguese infatuation with England and France, describing his country, in a famous essay entitled “O francesismo”, as “um país traduzido do francês em vernáculo”. He was also personally familiar with both countries, having worked as a diplomat in Newcastle, Bristol and Paris, where he penned many of his most famous novels.

---

It was perhaps due to these various cultural and geographical displacements that Eça came to adopt a more critical relationship to the movement that he nonetheless participated in and actively promoted. In the above passage detailing the homoerotic bathhouse, for example, the Naturalist penchant for detail and precision is undercut by the suggestive power of syntax and imagery. Indeed, despite Machado de Assis’s famous description of Eça as “um fiel e aspérrimo discípulo do realismo propagado pelo autor do Assommoir”, critics have long drawn attention to the author’s lack of confidence in the epistemological and transformative potential of Naturalism that its first proponents had promised. Even over the course of his literary career, his style shifts considerably from a darker and more Zola-esque tone to an apparently more optimistic one, and two of his major novels, A reliquia and O mandarim, include elements of the supernatural and fantastical. One could even suggest that Eça’s discomfort with Naturalism reaches the point of satire and disdain: one of his most memorable and eccentric characters, João da Ega from the esquerda caviar elite of Os Maias, professes to be writing a novel called Memórias de um átomo, narrated by an atom, that ten years later remains unfinished. Ega’s comic search for a disembodied, “objective” representation of the world bears no fruit. To return to the question at hand, therefore, Eça’s work seems ripe for an investigation into the representation of “nature”, and indeed kinship, not least because of his much-commented preoccupation with incest, which I will also be addressing in this chapter. Indeed, as Jane Spencer argues, kinship metaphors are an

---

9 See, for example, Eça’s letter to Rodrigues de Freitas, in which he describes Realism as “um auxiliar poderoso da ciência revolucionária”. Eça de Queirós, Correspondência (Lisboa: Caminho, 2008), p. 135. Eça also spoke at the conferences organised by the Geração de ‘70 at the Casino Lisbonense, giving a lecture entitled “A nova literatura: o realismo com nova expressão da arte” on 12th June 1971. See António Salgado Júnior, História das Conferências do Casino (Lisboa: Cooperativa Militar, 1930).

13 See Eça de Queirós, O mandarim (São Paulo, Z edições, 2013) and A reliquia (Porto: Porto Editora, 2006). All page references are to these editions.
“organizing principle” of the canon and literary history;\(^\text{14}\) when Eça describes Flaubert, for example, as reaching “alta glória... um dos primeiros, [o] mais original em dar à arte contemporânea a sua verdadeira base”, who gave his characters “o poder da vitalidade”;\(^\text{15}\) he employs a generative, paternal metaphor, one that gains traction when considering the influence of the French masters in the formation of the self-described Geração de '70,\(^\text{16}\) of which Eça was the great literary star. If, therefore, as Maria Manuel Lisboa claims, Os Maias participates in the Naturalist tradition only to undo its principles at their very core,\(^\text{17}\) it is perhaps inviting to read Eça’s work as a canonical “betrayal” of his inherited discourse fuelled by the relatively marginal position of the language and culture in which he wrote.

However, if Eça thus resembles Harold Bloom’s characterisation of the “strong” poet who writes against his literary masters,\(^\text{18}\) it is curious that such a comparison might arise in conjunction with Phillip Rothwell’s claim, in one of the few studies to cast a “queer” glance at kinship in his work, that “throughout Eça, father figures are fundamentally weak”.\(^\text{19}\) As we shall see, his novels are notable for their male protagonists who “fail” in their attempts at paternal identification, buckling under social expectations for them as fathers and lovers and who are reminiscent, too, of Dom Sebastião, a parallel which Rothwell himself draws. It is this weak paternal function that takes centre stage in O Barão de Lavos, where a crumbling empire is inscribed into the figure of a “degenerate” and heirless patriarch. However, as I will argue in the present chapter, Eça does something strikingly different to Abel Botelho. Taking the above passage as a point of departure, I analyse a range of social relations across Eça’s work in which the nature of desire — understood in the sense of the libido, the glue that binds individuals together — might be considered unclear and potentially eroticised. The resulting ambiguity, particularly when these relations appear to be clearly named and categorised, points towards an insufficiency in the available language of desire and kinship, confusing the terms of relationality. Therefore, whilst Botelho generally attempts to restrict and “diagnose” desire, Eça allows its irreducible nature to flourish, dwelling on the inadequacy of his own available lexis. He thus problematises normative kinship as a signifying, socialising system, criticising its instrumentality in engendering the dynamics of power — patriarchal capitalism — experienced in the West at the time. Accordingly, a series of “failed” fathers, sons and daughters suffer the tragic consequences of an insufficiency in the experience of desire and relationality, ever constrained by the demands of patrilinear inheritance, marriage and (re)production. Curiously, however, by exposing undecidability in the (typically naturalised) language of relationality, often with recourse to alternative epistemologies such as Greek tragedy, Eça weakens the discourse, inherited from Zola and Flaubert, on its own terms, reworking it to represent a country that had been marginalised by the rise of “science”.

---

\(^{17}\) Maria Manuel Lisboa, Teu amor fez de mim um lago triste: ensaios sobre Os Maias (Campo das Letras, 2000), pp. 333-93.

As we shall see, across the spectrum of Eça’s novels we find recurring incidents not just of incest, but of schoolboy sweethearts, kissing comrades and sodomitic priests that work against the grain of the normative kinship structure by confusing such terms as brother, lover and sister.
However, with a few more recent exceptions, the body of scholarship on Eça’s work has overwhelmingly taken an implicit heteronormative view of erotic relations, appearing to assume that desire operates exclusively on a heterosexual axis. The vast tome by João Gaspar Simões, for example, Vida e Obra de Eça de Queirós, describes sexual desire in Eça as an “espada de fogo apartando o macho da fêmea”. Beatriz Berrini identifies Teodorico’s ardent desire for women in A relíquia, but omits any discussion of his interest in men such as Crispim and the “formoso Manassés” (pp. 144, 153), to which I will return at the end of this chapter. Saraiva speaks of the “encontro de príncipes” in Os Maias as a relationship of esteem and admiration, but does not consider the erotic potential of the “belo príncipe” (as I will argue, a recurring figure across Eça’s work). Nor does Alexander Coleman in his discussion of such a relationship in A cidade e as serras, which Carlos Reis, too, describes as “amizade fraternal”. As we shall see, such readings might overlook the troubling of the language of desire and indeed Naturalism itself, as well as the extent to which the examination of kinship figures at the heart, rather than at the surface, of the author’s concerns surrounding cultural centrality, marginality and decline.

Indeed, maintaining a heteronormative perspective of Eça’s work risks reading the discourse of degeneration at face value. Although degeneration theory does not govern Eça’s writing to the extent that it does Botelho’s, it nevertheless features prominently: the author himself described Portugal as “uma sociedade podre” which he was preparing for its ruin, echoing the 21 Simões, p. 561.

pp. 247-85.

24 Carlos Reis, Estatuto e Perspectivas do Narrador na Ficção de Eça de Queirós (Coimbra: Livraria

“national degeneration” theories of Herbert Spencer that other members of the Geração de ‘70, such as Oliveira Martins, took particularly seriously. However, critics have tended to read incestuous and “homosexual” desire — when this latter rarely gets a mention — as symptomatic of this “sociedade podre”, a result and reflection of the nation in “decline”, materially so where the question of empire was concerned, and assumedly so according to contemporaneous theories of degeneration. Happily, some more recent work has parted considerably with this thesis. Maria Manuel Lisboa in particular has read the central incestuous relationship in Os Maias as gesturing towards a new beginning rather than symbolising the end of the nation. In a similar vein, I want to argue that, unlike in Lavos, the disruption to kinship and erotic desire in Eça might be read as a yearning for a new social structure rather than as a lament for the demise of an old one. Going a step further, I propose that the revelation of an insufficiency in the language of desire entails a radical questioning of Naturalist claims to absolute truth, such that kinship and Naturalism meet their discursive limits at the periphery of the Naturalist canon. By implicating normative kinship in the production and understanding of “truth”, most especially in A reliquia, the entire system of representation is called into question. And in this sense, we can view Eça’s work as a high point in the Lusophone tradition of writing “against nature”, an undoing of Naturalist discourse as implicated in the consolidation of a socio-economic system that (re)produced geopolitical hierarchies.

The recent work of a number of scholars provides a departure point for a series of readings that, at the textual level, seek to tease out the ambiguous nature of erotic desire in Eça. Firstly, Ana Paula Ferreira has analysed the perplexing short story “José Matias”, in which she identifies a “will to know” on the part of the narrator in relation to his feminised subject that echoes the “homosexual panic” of the fin de siècle. She also raises the possibility of other such characters in Eça’s novels, and I will return to “José Matias” later in light of these. A highly original article by José Carlos Barcellos, meanwhile, identifies a series of relationships in Eça’s novels in which there is a “continuidade básica” between homosociability and homoeroticism. However, Barcellos then restores a distinction between “homosexuals” and “heterosexuals” in his analysis, which can prove problematic when trying to capture the ambiguities in the texts. Meanwhile, Phillip Rothwell and Anna Klobucka have addressed the issue from a different perspective. Klobucka studies the figure of Libaninho in O crime do Padre Amaro, a clerk and later sacristan who is caught in the act with a local sergeant, to whom I will return in due course. Rothwell, who derives the aforementioned concept of “weak paternity”, explores the homoerotic implications of the “belo príncipe” in A cidade e as serras, whereby the narrator is “besotted” with his friend Jacinto, a Portuguese aristocrat seeking identification as a father. In many ways, the present chapter builds on Barcellos’ work, analysing relationships across a range of Eça’s novels in which the nature of erotic desire is ambiguous, and assessing their significance in relation to the author’s critique of Naturalism and patriarchal capitalism. However, I will also be extending Rothwell’s study of weak paternity and sebastianismo in Eça, bringing it into play with Lisboa’s work on the radical implications of incestuous desire, arguing that if an unstable kinship system indeed leads to weak fathers, it is the inherited Naturalist discourse that is ultimately undermined.

---

28 See Maria Manuel Lisboa, Teu amor fez de mim...

30 Ibid., note to p. 328.

A cidade e as serras: queering oedipus

Of course, when I speak of “failed” fathers and betrayal, I am invoking the (il)logic of the Oedipus complex. The readings of both Lisboa and Rothwell, indeed, draw significantly on Freudian psychoanalysis (if, in the latter’s case, via Lacan) to explore the political complicities of family and nation. Lisboa, for example, convincingly reads Carlos’ amorous passion for his long-lost sister in Os Maias as repressed desire for the lost mother, and allegorises their relationship to an Iberianist approximation of Portugal and Spain, the “nação-irmã”. However, whilst Oedipal readings can doubtless prove productive, the Freudian matrix is problematic when concerned with non-normative desire and kinship trouble since, as we shall see, it implicitly depends upon fathers, sons and daughters as fixed symbolic positions. As a result, naturalised kinship can be read back into texts that at some level trouble such a concept. I will address this problem shortly; for now, I would like to begin with a more detailed discussion of Rothwell’s study of non-normative desire because, besides being one of the first, it elicits well the way in which queer desire is bound up with questions of paternal (dis)identification.

---

33 Rothwell, p. 79.

In his reading of A cidade e as serras, Eça’s last novel, Rothwell describes how Jacinto’s journey from the supercivilização of Paris to the rustic pleasures of rural Portugal is accompanied by the development of an interest in women. Returning to his ancestral home in the Douro to rebury the unearthed bones of his forefathers, Jacinto subsequently marries and has children, finally achieving satisfaction in life after years of tedium and endless “bocejos” in Paris. The novel, according to Rothwell, is structured by a “suppressed homoerotic framework”. While in Paris, Jacinto and the narrator, Zé Fernandes, who refers to Jacinto as “meu belo príncipe”, enjoy an especially close relationship, described by Rothwell as “flirtatious”, and Jacinto displays little interest in women. This changes after his arrival in Portugal: by burying his forefathers’ bones and finding a wife, Jacinto assumes the father’s name and finds lasting happiness; seemingly resolving, in Rothwell’s view, the Oedipus complex.

Yet Rothwell, even as he suggests a resolution, also draws attention the potential instability of Jacinto’s “post-Oedipal” state. The remains of Jacinto’s forefathers turn out to be too jumbled to reassemble, with bones from different skeletons thrown together to occupy the new graves, impeding proper burial. Furthermore, the return of the possessive phrase “meu belo príncipe” at the end of the novel, after briefly giving way to simply “Jacinto” post-marriage, questions whether or not the pair’s former intimacy has been buried either. “O meu Príncipe, atrigueirado nas soalheiras e nos ventos da serra, a minha prima Joaninha […] e eu, […] trilhando um solo eterno, e de eterna solidez” (p. 278), concludes the narrator, with a tinge of physical admiration for his newly countrified brother-in-law, whose marriage he oddly appears to complete, eternally, até que a morte os separe. Eça therefore colours the ostensibly happy ending (and Jacinto’s marriage) with the suggestion that the ghosts of the past may yet resurface to haunt attempts to exclude them, never resolving the question of Jacinto’s relationship with Zé Fernandes. Although Rothwell

---

35 As Luce Irigaray reminds us, Freudian theory “remains paradoxically subject to [the philosophical order of] discourse where the definition of sexual difference is concerned”. See This Sex Which is Not One, translated by Catherine Porter and Catherine Burke (New York: Ithaca, 1985), p. 72.

36 Eça de Queirós, A cidade e as serras (Lisboa: Biblioteca Editores, 2009). All page references are to this edition.

37 Rothwell, pp. 79-86.

38 Ibid., p. 79.

39 Ibid., p. 80.
asserts that the friends’ love is “reduced to a coarse sexual act” at one point, he does not provide a citation and this reader at least can find no evidence of such a consummative incident. On the contrary, any desire seems subliminal, glimpsed perhaps in the pair’s candlelit pillow talk on their first night in Portugal, when Jacinto repeatedly calls out “Zé Fernandes…” elliptically in the dark, only to suggest inconsequential chores for the next day (A cidade, pp. 167-9); or perhaps earlier in Jacinto’s insistence on taking Zé with him to see his Parisian “lover”, Madame D’Oriol (p. 107). The novel never commits to certainties surrounding sex and sexuality; as Klobucka notes, A cidade “lacks a clearly labelled homosexual figure comparable to… the eponymous protagonist of Abel Botelho’s novel O Barão de Lavos”.

This indeterminacy of desire, however, even in Jacinto’s supposedly “post-Oedipal” state, calls for a reexamination of the emerging psychoanalytic theories of the time, which in many ways navigated, often problematically, the same ambiguities. Freud’s formulation of the Oedipus complex, as we know, holds that little boys “typically” identify with the father and take the mother as the object of desire. Fearing punishment under the father’s law — castration anxiety — the boy opts to become like the father, attaining a privileged social position that compensates for the loss of the mother. In such a formulation, post-Oedipus, identification and sexual desire are assumed to move along different gendered axes and are rendered mutually exclusive. The mother, later her image, figures as the object of desire and the father as the subject with whom one identifies; the matrix of identification is based upon an assumption of gender difference as absolute alterity and — despite Freud’s assertion of an earlier, primary bisexuality — upon a homo/heterosexual system of oppositional desires. In A cidade, we perhaps glimpse something of this primary bisexuality since erotic desire is not clearly directed towards one particular sex, made manifest in the confused marital threesome at the novel’s conclusion. Jacinto’s seemingly successful paternal

Ibid., p. 79.

The narrator’s references to “Sodoma” and “Lesbos” (p. 96) to which Rothwell may here be referring are used to describe the supposedly decadent people of Paris, and not ostensibly the pair themselves, who are viewing the city from a physical and critical distance. We could of course read this as Zé’s oblique warning to Jacinto and thus something of an unintended admission of guilt, but once again the ambiguity is insoluble.

Anna Klobucka, “Border Crossings: Transnationalism and Sexuality in Gombrowicz’s Trans-Atlantyk and Eça de Queirós’s A cidade e as serras” (paper presented at the conference Intra Muros, Ante Portas: Iberian and Slavonic Cultures in Contact and Comparison, Universidade de Lisboa, May 2008).

identification (through marriage to his undoubtedly appealing, and motherly, “lavradeirona […] rechonchuda” [p. 128]) is undercut by covert suggestions of his continued “perversion”.

There are other moments in Freud’s extensive body of work that create space for the more fluid configuration of desire and identification encountered in A cidade. Indeed, although Freud at one point “explains” male homosexuality as an “inversion” of the Oedipus complex, entailing identification with the mother and desire for the father, he also stresses that:

[...]

Curiously, then, Freud undercuts his own schema of oppositional desires with the assertion that all individuals experience, at some level, its “normal” and “inverted” forms. This suggestion is, in fact, central to his claim that desire for the father works to mobilise a boy’s identification with him, his image serving as an ego ideal upon which to model himself. As Michael Warner asks of the Freudian model: why must identification with the father end the possibility of desiring him? Kaja Silverman notes similarly that, insofar as the Oedipal boy longs for the image of the father, the latter remains “susceptible to sexualization; eros is never far away”. Curiously, then, homosexual desire is implicated in the development of the very Oedipal framework that seeks to consolidate its “abnormality”. My reason for drawing attention to these tensions in Freud’s own work is to highlight the importance of recognising a potentially fluid or heterogenous field of desire that, placed under the lens of psychoanalytic thought, is obscured even as it assigned a critical role in producing the norm. Thus we might ask, to return to A cidade e as serras, and working in the other direction, against nature perhaps, what exactly does the novel’s confusion of desire and identification render unstable? Is it Jacinto’s post-Oedipal identity, troubled by “perverse” desires — or is it more than this, the very matrix upon which Oedipal identifications are perceived to be negotiated, in which mothers and fathers figure as fixed kinship positions with opposing symbolic functions? Indeed, when Jacinto marries Joana at the end — Zé’s cousin and thus the closest being to him in flesh

---

45 Rothwell, p. 86.

47 See, for example, Freud, “On Narcissism…”, p. 91.

48 Warner, p. 194.

and blood — it is unclear whether it is the image of the mother or the father that is being desired, blurring the coordinates of “normal” Oedipal development.

The subsequent readings therefore, whilst drawing on Freudian psychoanalysis, do so on the understanding that the language of desire and identification is bound up with the naturalisation of a particular (heteronormative) form of kinship and relationality. Focussing instead on ambiguity in erotic desire, I hope to demonstrate how Eça mounts a challenge to the established mode of constructing social relations, reproduced over the generations with tragic consequences for the individual and nation. In the following reading of Os Maias, I explore how the potential for eroticism in relationships that ostensibly prohibit such desire calls for a reevaluation of the terms — brother, father, friend, lover — that structure social ties. These terms are confounded and rendered inadequate, obscuring, as with Jacinto, the path to “successful” Oedipal development that they purportedly serve to elucidate. As we shall see, Eça, in contrast to Botelho, writes against the naturalised language of relationality to gesture towards a different mode of building family, society and nation.

Amigos coloridos

Os Maias (1888) is the story of the demise of the ancient Maia family. Spanning four generations, the novel focuses on the life of Carlos, the last of the Maias, raised by his grandfather Afonso. When Carlos is a baby, his father Pedro commits suicide after his wife, Maria Monforte, elopes with a minor Italian aristocrat, taking Carlos’ sister, Maria Eduarda, away with her. Assumed dead, Maria Eduarda disappears from the lives of Carlos and Afonso and is rarely spoken of again, disavowed perhaps; however, when the family returns to Lisbon in the 1870s, Carlos unwittingly begins a passionate affair with her, believing her initially to be the wife of a Brazilian businessman, Castro Gomes. The incestuous nature of what seems like their perfect love for each other is finally revealed at the end of the novel, and the two sibling-lovers separate forever, Carlos remaining unmarried and seemingly unable to provide an heir to the family.

Like Jacinto in A cidade e as serras, Carlos da Maia is described as a “belo príncipe” by his peers. “Beautiful princes” abound across Eça’s work, where they function as figures that obscure the limits of friendship and confuse the logic of identification. Although Carlos is admired throughout Lisbon, his sycophant par excellence is surely Dâmaso Salcende, who declares everything Carlos owns, does and says to be “podre de chique”, a decidedly vernacular compliment that betrays his lower social class. Lisboa describes their relationship as idolatrous, 50 Eça de Queirós, Os Maias (Porto: Porto Editora, 2006). All page references are to this edition.

Carlos being “fanaticamente admirado”, the model for Dâmaso’s ego ideals. Dâmaso regularly copies Carlos’ behaviour and appearance, such as his beard, “que havia meses deixara crescer para imitar Carlos” (p. 374), a performative imitation designed to codify him, like with Eugénio in Lavos, as a fashionable member of the social elite. Barcellos is reluctant to attribute more to Dâmaso’s attachment than a “sentimento de emulação”; however, he describes Dâmaso as one of the novel’s several “heterossexuais”, perhaps leading him to overlook an ambiguously physical and covetous element to his attraction. For example, he identifies the portrait of Carlos on horseback, kept by Dâmaso in his rooms, as a marker of idolatry, yet the portrait verges uncomfortably on the romantic, with its "vistoso caixilho de flores em faiança" (p. 552), a garish, rosy display of his sentiments for Carlos, evoking his presence even in his absence. Furthermore, the accompanying silk slipper, purchased upon Carlos’ recommendation that the room contain a "relíquia de amor" is wonderfully ironic: is it far more a relic of his "love" for Carlos than it is any woman.

The quality of Dâmaso's attachment is further complicated by his first sighting of Carlos. After the two are introduced, the narrator remarks that Dâmaso “não despregava os olhos de Carlos” (p. 157). Transfixed by Carlos' presence and never averting his gaze, there is the hint of physical attraction. At the end of the novel, when the former friends encounter each other upon Carlos' visit to Lisbon, the attraction seems to be rekindled:

— Adeus, rapazes. Tu estás bom, Carlos, estás com boa cara!
— É dos teus olhos, Dâmaso.
E nos olhos do Dâmaso, com efeito, parecia reviver a antiga admiração, arregalados, acompanhando Carlos (p. 698).

É dos teus olhos, Dâmaso: beauty is truly in the eye of the beholder. Dâmaso’s body language, too, regularly reflects his apparent fascination with Carlos; when they are first introduced, “aproximou-se do Maia, banhado num sorriso” (p. 158). At the Cohens’ dinner, he is found to be “todo debruçado sobre Carlos” (p. 171), describing his friend as “a melhor coisa que hâ em Lisboa [...] acredite [...] que isto é do coração!” (p. 176) — the heart, as Dr. Gouveia says in O crime do Padre Amaro (p. 239), being a polite allusion to another part of the body. Dâmaso soon becomes inseparable from him, achieving an “intimidade de rosas” (p. 190). Nominally a friend, then, Dâmaso in fact appears to harbour a libidinal interest in his “belo príncipe” that, even if not manifestly erotic, is so strong as to risk exceeding the parameters of friendship, or at the least to question where they lie.

---

51 Lisboa, p. 255.
52 Barcellos, p. 186.
53 Ibid., p. 200.
Dâmaso's infatuation with Carlos is prefigured in the previous generation by Pedro's admiration for the handsome Neapolitan nobleman, Tancredo, who elopes with Maria Monforte, Carlos' mother. This is a parallel to which I will return later in this chapter; for now I would like to signal the repetition and resurfacing of the same confused terms of friendship across the generations. Tancredo is variously described by Pedro — who begins an intimate friendship with him almost overnight — as “um heró”, “belo rapaz”, “rapaz adorável”, “o príncipe” (pp. 39-40) and by the narrator as “um homem esplêndido, feito como um Apolo, de uma palidez de mármore rico [...] uma fisionomia de belo Cristo” (p. 42). The references to classical notions of beauty in the figure of Apollo, the athletic god of truth and poetry, resonate with those in Botelho’s O Barão de Lavos, where the Baron’s Pygmalion-like fascination with his efebo recalls the Platonic model of pederasty, implicating homoeroticism in the transmission of knowledge and self-development.

Similarly, when the narrator of A correspondência de Fradique Mendes describes his intellectual idol as having “a forma… de um mármore divino” and dazzling “pele láctea”, we glimpse the erotic potential of the subject of identification, curiously articulated through a return to an older mode of understanding male relations. However, despite his invocation of Apollonian beauty, Pedro, a Romantic man of the moment, describes his relationship with Tancredo as one of exemplary friendship: “somos como dois irmãos de armas” (p. 42). In this manner, friendships have the potential to become invested with the erotic when they are identified in terms of a brotherly camaraderie that recalls the modern Republican ideals of equality and fraternity. For Montaigne, who draws on Plato’s emphasis on knowledge and learning in (male) relationships, the finest form of friendship is a union of souls, with desire for the body “fickle”, subject to change and untrustworthy. Tancredo, indeed, proves to be a treacherous brother-friend, and Carlos and Dâmaso grow to loathe each other, so much so that Carlos vows to kill him on account of an injurious newspaper article, suggesting there is very little, if any reciprocity to these relationships. Instead, the pattern of identification, infatuation and then hatred following betrayal recalls the primary narcissistic pleasure that the child feels upon (mis)recognising himself in the mirror, any threat to which induces rage. However, that Dâmaso and Pedro both believe these to be, on the contrary, great friendships, examples of brotherly love, demonstrates the inadequacy of the terms

---

54 The Platonic concept of pederastic love is detailed more fully in the previous chapter. See Plato, Symposium, translated by Benjamin Jowett (Rockville, Maryland: Serenity Publishers, 2009), p. 52.

55 Eça de Queirós, A correspondência de Fradique Mendes (Lisboa: Livros do Brasil, 2002), pp. 29, 35.

56 Incidentally, “camarada” — English “comrade” — ultimately derives from Latin camera (“bedroom, chamber”), which was modified in Spanish to mean “one with whom one shares one’s bedroom”, thus originating in notions of physical proximity. See <http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=comrade> (accessed 09/04/14).

used to articulate friendship and brotherhood, even as they are reproduced problematically across time. The return to an eroticised classical discourse in particular comes to pressure the modern, republican terms of male friendship as “natural”.

Even Carlos and João da Ega, his best friend, a pair whom Lisboa has described as having a purely asexual relationship without the least insinuation of sexual desire, appear to push the boundaries at times. On two extraordinary occasions, Ega seems to treat Carlos as a lover while inebriated. The first time is in Coimbra:

[Carlos] teve de o arrastar à casa das Seixas, despi-lo, aturar-lhe os beijos e a ternura borracha, até que o deixou abraçado ao travesseiro, babando-se (p. 182).

The second such occurrence arises when Ega is taken to Craft’s house after a disastrous night at the Cohens’ fancy-dress party:

[…] apanharam João da Ega. E enquanto o levavam para o quarto dos hóspedes e lhe despiam o fato de Satanás, não cessou de choramingar, dando beijos babosos pelas mãos de Carlos, balbuciando

— Raquelzinha!... Racaquê, minha Raquelzinha! Gostas do teu bibichinho?… (p. 279).

In vino veritas? Ega’s drunken effusiveness here may have a significance beyond comic effect. In As Máscaras do Desengano, Isabel Pires de Lima identifies a series of discomfiting analogies in Os Maias that testify to an age of profound moral ambiguity. Ega and Carlos, for example, initially heralded as “espíritos superiores”, turn out to be uncomfortably like their ostensible inferiors.

Dâmaso’s obsession with Carlos would be risible if it were not so akin to Carlos’ admiration for Craft, an Englishman who rivals Carlos in his reputation for refined taste. Ega’s demonstrations of affection towards Carlos — and Carlos’ timely undressing Ega’s Satanic costume — might constitute just such an awkward analogy: by confusing man for woman, friend for lover, when inhibitions are lowered, Eça suggests that, in the end, a friend may never be “simply” a friend.

The lack of qualitative difference between friend and lover, a concern that in the West goes back to Greco-Roman antiquity, is confirmed when, at the end of Os Maias, Carlos and Ega, described twice as “como irmãos”, do not in fact turn out to be lifetime companions. Ega asks Carlos if he will ever return to Lisbon:

— Lisboa, p. 181.

— Lisboa, p. 255.

— In Os Maias, the word “irmão” is used to describe several male friendships. Alencar describes Carlos as like a brother to him, and Cohen uses the word interchangeably with “amigo”: “um amigo, um irmão” (p. 129).
Então Ega perguntou, do fundo do sofá onde se enterrara, se, nesses últimos anos, ele não tivera a ideia, o vago desejo de voltar para Portugal… (p. 713)

The ellipsis here connotes a palpable longing for his friend and “brother”. But Carlos replies that he will remain in Paris, thus deserting his “brother” much in the manner that he deserts his lover-sister, Maria Eduarda: sibling-love of any kind could never be. Furthermore, seemingly unable to pursue intimate relationships following his incestuous affair, Carlos equally cannot return to the old days of the Ramalhete, where he and Ega lived together for long periods. He becomes estranged from both “siblings”, that is, friend-sibling and lover-sibling, completing the sense that both social- and sexual love, both figurative and physical love, are subject to the same constraints, and may indeed by at some level indistinguishable.

A potential inability to distinguish friend from lover is at least the implied conclusion of Montaigne when he speculates that a union of bodies as well as souls could result in the most perfect loving relationship between men. Some of the most enduring and harmonious male friendships in Eça — Jacinto and Zé Fernandes, and (as we shall see in Basílio) Jorge and Sebastião — are those in which genuine reciprocity (as opposed to Dâmaso’s unreciprocated, hierarchical idolatry) is accompanied by desire of a confused or indeterminate physical nature, as though they could or might be lovers. That Carlos ends Os Maias physically separated from both Ega and Maria Eduarda, formerly the perfect friend and the perfect lover, is the effect not of a perceived inviability in ambiguous, potentially incestuous desire but, on the contrary, of the restoration of kinship certainties after Maria Monforte’s letter confirming the lovers’ consanguinity is fatally handed to Ega. His decision to inform the family initiates a return to normative kinship and transparency in relationships, suspending Carlos’ most important ones indefinitely.

Perhaps the most overt manifestation of the imputation of sexual desire into friendship and fraternity in Eça is in O crime when Libaninho, a devout office clerk — “o beato mais activo de Leiria”, who though a layman claims to be in God’s service, spreading His word at the local barracks (p. 432) — is caught in flagrante delicto with a sergeant. Whether brothers in arms or brothers of the church, the necessity for asexual camaraderie in such institutions is made apparent precisely through the possibility of breaking the rule: the establishment of an asexual imperative 62 Lisboa refers to Ega as Carlos’ “amigo-irmão” (p. 239).

---

63 Montaigne, p. 211.
64 Eça de Queirós, O crime do Padre Amaro (Lisboa: Editora Livros do Brasil, 2013), p. 59. All page references are to this edition.
paradoxically implies a potential for sexuality to surface.\textsuperscript{65} “Brother” thus implicitly carries with it that which it purports to exclude, surely highlighted by the chilling parallel to which Carlos draws attention in \textit{Os Maias}, realising that he and Maria Eduarda, having shared a bed as adults, once shared a cradle as infants (p. 621). Indeed, when a brother can be so many things, the words of Padre Natário in \textit{O crime} ring true in a particularly ironic sense: “todos somos irmãos! Todos somos irmãos!” (p. 191). In the sexual relations between Libaninho and the sergeant, which are also symbolically incestuous as a love between “brothers”, the confusion of friend, brother and lover is complete. The foundations of the Church and the army — those mainstays of the nation — collapse if the terms of kinship are revealed to be inadequate, the discourse of republican “fraternity” finding its unspeakable limit. The resulting scandal is inevitable: as Anna Klobucka notes, Libaninho is swiftly relegated to “the bottom of [the] hierarchy”, losing his job at the office, and the fact that he later obtains a professional role at the cathedral probably says more about the Church’s hypocrisy than it suggests any scope for a more flexible structure in such institutions.\textsuperscript{66}

If, as Gayle Rubin and others have argued,\textsuperscript{67} normative kinship presupposes exogamous heterosexuality, the inadequacy of kinship terms in Eça can be read as revealing rather than concealing these presuppositions. Whilst Lavos, for example, naturalises normative kinship by pathologising and restricting “deviant” relations, Eça effectively writes against the naturalised language of relationality by pointing to its excesses and insufficiencies. Thus terms such as friend, lover and brother threaten to become porous and mobile, merging into each other. A friend’s love may be physical and covetous. A friend can be a brother, but then may be (mis)taken for a lover. A lover, meanwhile, can be (mis)taken for a brother, as Basílio in \textit{O primo Basílio} understands when he describes his \textit{rendez-vous} with Luísa as “um passeio de amigos, de irmãos” (p. 120). Most famously in Eça, in the relationship between Carlos and Maria, a brother can \textit{be} a lover. The normative assumptions of the kinship system are made visible, pressuring the hegemonic mode of relationality.

As we have seen, critical work on Eça has often read the incestuous relationship at the heart of \textit{Os Maias} as symptomatic of the “situação estagnada de Portugal” precipitated by \textit{fin-de-siècle} decadence.\textsuperscript{68} Maria Manuel Lisboa’s reading parts with this thesis, arguing instead that the

\textsuperscript{66} Klobucka, p. 139.

\textsuperscript{68} Macedo, vii.
“amor perfeito” between Carlos and Maria is in fact a gesture towards “um novo começo”, an “antídoto” to, rather than a symptom of, the status quo that enforces a taboo on their perfect love. (It is, indeed, their eventual decision to end their relationship that quashes this remedial gesture and constitutes the true marker of resignation and decadence in the novel.) In a similar vein, the troubling of kinship in Eça through queer and erotically indeterminate desires represents not the “atmosfera dolente de Lisboa” (as Pires de Lima writes of the implied homosexual relations of Charlie Gouvarinho at the end of Os Maias) but an attack on the status quo, revealing the restrictions imposed on desire to be insufficient insofar as they produce what they purport to exclude. There is evidently a disruption to the discourse of republicanism — liberté, égalité, fraternité — at play here, particularly since the variously eroticised, idolatrous relationships entail a social pecking order that undercuts any suggestions of equality, as though the pretence to “fraternity” amongst the dominant classes disguises a governing dynamic of hierarchy and competition, a hypothesis I will return to later. The disruption to “fraternal” discourse also entails a problematisation of the politics of identification in patriarchal society since its terms can be exceeded, presenting an obstacle to complying with the societal desiderata of oppositional, reproductive desire and fatherhood. As we shall see shortly, the nation’s sons are accordingly destined to follow the same fate as poor Gonçalo in A ilustre casa de Ramires (1900), who devotes himself to glorifying his forefathers in literary endeavour but whom we never see become a father himself. Similarly, although Jacinto does become a biological father in A cidade, his journey to paternal identification is troubled by the same conflict, his relationships of such an imprecise “nature” that the paternal function cannot be assumed with any degree of stability. The muddled bones at the end surely symbolise this uncertainty: Jacinto will never know which father is which, their bodies quite literally confounded beyond recognition.

---

69 Lisboa, p. 81.

70 Ibid., p. 108.

71 Ibid., p. 102.

72 Lima, p. 178.

73 Eça de Queirós, A ilustre casa de Ramires (Porto: Porto Editora, 2006). All page references are to this edition.

74 David Frier also questions the extent to which the later novels A cidade and A ilustre casa end successfully with regards to paternity and future security. See “Transcender o passado ou perder-se no passado? À procura de comunidades imaginadas n’A ilustre casa de Ramires e n’A cidade e as serras”, Queirosiana, 21-22 (2010-11), pp. 57-73.
Continuing to focus on the insufficiencies in the language of desire and kinship that distort the normative Oedipal matrix, I would now like to return in more detail to O primo Basílio, Eça’s second major novel, where these insufficiencies acquire disastrous consequences. The novel tells the story of Luísa and Jorge, a petit-bourgeois couple living in the (appropriately named, as it transpires) Patriarchal Queimada neighbourhood of Lisbon. Whilst her husband is away on business in the Alentejo, Luísa begins an adulterous affair with her cousin and first love, Basílio. Basílio eventually deserts Luísa, continuing to Madrid, as we have seen, with his friend Reinaldo, but in events that again implicate class disparities, Luísa’s covetous maid spitefully retains a love letter and blackmails her way into becoming mistress of the house. Eventually learning his wife’s secret, Jorge confronts Luísa, precipitating her death from shock and delirium.

This reading will focus on the relationship between Jorge and his best friend Sebastião, who live together both before and after Jorge’s calamitous marriage to Luísa. As with Jacinto in A cidade, Jorge’s attempts at paternal identification are hampered by the confusion of desire and relationality. The male pair christen themselves the “Sociedade Sebastião e Jorge” (p. 110), a term that undercuts the sense of a business partnership — which typically calls for surnames — with the intimacy of marriage. Indeed, before Jorge meets Luísa, there is a honeymoon-like phase in their relationship in which they discuss their grand plans for the future, involving living together.

Sebastião, upon his first appearance, is described in the following terms:

> Era ele, Sebastião, o grande Sebastião, o Sebastiârrão, o Sebastião tronco de árvore, — o íntimo, o camarada, o inseparável de Jorge, desde o latim, na aula de Frei Libório, aos Paulistas. (p. 39)

He is named in seven different ways, the breathless asyndeton here suggesting that no adequate superlative can be recalled to describe him. Interestingly, he is identified as a “camarada”, but the italicised “inseparável” undercuts this term by suggesting dependency, as though Sebastião is Jorge’s perfect other half, or indeed his brother. The mention of early school days may not be coincidental either, given that this is where Luísa and Leopoldina, and (in A reliquia) Teodorico and Crispim have their first (homo)sexual experiences. In any case, their grand plans are interrupted by Jorge’s marriage to Luísa:

> Todo aquele plano jovial da Sociedade Sebastião e Jorge — chamavam-lhe assim, rindo — desabou, como um castelo de cartas. Sebastião teve um grande pesar. (p. 110)

---

75 Known today as Príncipe Real, it was once the rubbish dump of Bairro Alto, regenerated in the nineteenth century, and thus epitomises the ascent of the bourgeoisie. See http://lisboaverde.cm-lisboa.pt/index.php?id=4304 (accessed 29/3/16).
The reference to a folding castle of cards, reflecting the dramatic turnaround in fortunes that leaves Sebastião deeply saddened, suggests a collapse waiting to happen, an inevitable end to a kind of relationality that, expressed through the metaphor of a mirthful game, is associated with youth. Barcellos cautions against imputing an erotic motive into Sebastião’s attachment, and this need not be necessary; it is precisely the grey area of object attraction, male couplings and physical covetousness that, in early age and beyond, sets a rickety stage for a future marriage that supposedly organises desire along (straight) axes of gender. Their youthful relationship recalls the words of E. M. Forster: “feelings of beauty and tenderness […] like plants that are all leaves and show no sign of flower”.

Marriage thus comes to derail the Sociiedade Sebastião e Jorge and, as for Jacinto in A cidade, it seems closely bound up with a quest for paternal identification. Jorge’s decision to marry immediately proceeds his mother’s death, which provokes feelings of loneliness: “[q]uando sua mãe morreu, porém, começou a achar-se só […]. Decidiu casar” (p. 5). Luísa is sought as a replacement for the lost mother and provokes paternal attitudes in her husband. His bride is more of a daughter to him than a wife, described repeatedly in the diminutive as “A Luísa, a Luisinha […] um passarinho, como um passarinho amiga do ninho […]. [E] aquele serzinho louro e meigo veio dar à sua casa um encanto sério” (p. 6). Luísa is thus mother, daughter, wife and piece of decor all in one. The first chapter concludes with him laying down the law in his house: “di questo no parlaremo piú, o donna mia! À sopa!” (p. 26), whereby the transgressive and adulterous Leopoldina, who inspires “sensações […] intensas” (p. 155) in Luísa and is revealed to have been her first kiss at school — a rare incidence of Lesbian desire in Eça’s work — is barred from entry into the domestic sphere. Jorge thus tries to exclude desires (both adulterous and “queer”) that threaten his marriage from his home, asserting paternal authority over his daughter-wife whilst consigning his coupling with Sebastião to the past. Interestingly, Jorge articulates his law in Italian, a performative gesture that recalls the bourgeois fascination with Italian opera. Just as Verdi’s “La donna è mobile” paradoxically codifies a woman’s inconstancy to render it constant, so do Jorge’s words universalise “questo”, or his wife’s actions, speaking them beyond the household even as he sets out to silence them, foreshadowing the growing fragility of his law.

With Luísa appearing more to fill a hole in Jorge’s life than to excite new pleasures in him, their relationship is notably devoid of passion. They love each other “mediocremente”, as Eça

76 Barcellos, p. 203.
78 For a discussion of the influence of opera on Eça’s work, see Maria de Carvalho, “Eça de Queirós e a ópera no século XIX em Portugal”, in Revista Colóquio/Letras, May 1986, pp. 27-37.
79 Lisboa, p. 352.
points to ideological influences underpinning their marriage. The circumstances of their courtship, upon close reading, are remarkably dry:

Conheceu Luísa, no Verão, à noite, no Passeio. Apaixonou-se pelos seus cabelos louros, pela sua maneira de andar, pelos seus olhos castanhos muito grandes. No Inverno seguinte foi despachado, e casou. (p. 5)

The two sentences describing their acquaintance are marked by the pattern of three subordinated elements in the first sentence mirrored in the second, giving the effect of an empirical inventory of attributes that Jorge finds in Luísa, and again evoking the sense of a business transaction, despite the nominal reference to passion. Her appeal to Jorge seems wanting in romance and feeling, deriving instead from a preordained conception of beauty and eroticism with origins not in the self but in ideological interpellation, as though Luísa fortuitously fulfills Jorge’s expectations of a bourgeois bride. Their relationship is the reverse of that of Carlos and Maria in Os Maias: whilst the latter two follow burning inner passions, even for a time whilst Carlos is in full knowledge of their incestuous nature, Luísa and Jorge’s marriage follows the bourgeois ideal but is conspicuously devoid of inner passion. Jorge’s desire to be a patriarch and occupy the respected symbolic position that secures the family property — briefly successful when their friends perceive them to be an ideal couple — outweighs any authentic feelings for Luísa. As Eve Sedgwick argues, the social policing of desire in Victorian England had the aim of ensuring the exchange of women as a “currency” (to use Irigaray’s phrasing) in a patriarchal-capitalist world, a dynamic that collapses in O Barão de Lavos. Like with the Sociedade Jorge e Sebastião, Jorge’s “love” for Luísa becomes confused, perhaps, with the terms of a business transaction in which others can invest. His lacklustre desire for his wife, to the exclusion of all other desires in his house that threaten the social exchange of women, reflects precisely this problematic ideological interference with the passions.

Indeed, surely resulting from a lack of genuine feeling, the marriage is destined for “traições desastrosas”, and Luísa proves to be a wayward child, enacting an adulterous affair with her cousin and childhood sweetheart, Basílio, an affair that is also incestuous, or at least constitutes, according to Basílio himself, an “incestozinho” (p. 253). According to the old Portuguese adage, quanto mais prima, mais se arrima. Jorge cannot wield his law successfully; in the end, his “donna mia” slips from his control. Leopoldina, for example, is never really banished from the house, returning while Jorge is away in the Alentejo like the tiger who came to tea, exciting Luísa with stories of her romances and in part inspiring her to explore herself. His mother’s imposing portrait, in the apparent absence of his father’s, looms ominously over the household throughout the novel,

---

80 Sedgwick, p. 89 and Irigaray, p. 192.

81 Lisboa, p. 361.
as though overshadowing Jorge's attempts to identify as an authoritative father by choosing a daughter for a wife. Like Jacinto's forefathers who will not be properly buried, the portrait of Jorge's mother seems to bring her back from the dead, or indeed keeps her undead, disrupting his "replacement" of her with Luísa. His wife's death at the end leaves him lost for words: "que fiz eu?" (p. 419), he stutters, relinquishing himself of any responsibility. Weakened and distraught, Jorge's consolation is to move back in with Sebastião, this time indefinitely. His failure to possess his mother-daughter-wife and control his (f)law sends him back to his earlier state as the inseparable half of a male couple. He has no children, and we are left with the impression that his line will end with him. Paternal identification fails miserably: the marriage upon which it is founded falters because of a lack of authentic feeling between Jorge and Luísa, and by an inability to exclude "queer" desires — represented by both Leopoldina and cousin Basílio — from the marital home. The apparently "inauthentic", scripted manner of relations in the novel, contrasted with the happy though subordinated friendship of Jorge and Sebastião, thus chimes with the questioning of normative kinship performed by Engels in his contemporaneous, genealogical study of the development of patriarchal-capitalist society, and which I addressed in the introduction: the body politic is organised in accordance with the economic system of (re)production and inheritance, at the expense of rewarding personal relationships.

Dom Sebastião's “mistake” revisited

In this context it is interesting to examine the allegory of Dom Sebastião in O primo Basílio, a figure appearing, as usual, at the crossroads of kinship trouble, “weak” paternity, national dégénérescence and the limits of Naturalist discourse. The Geração de '70 identified him early on as a pivotal figure in Portuguese cultural decadência, holding him responsible for burying the last hopes of the nation in the battle of Alcácer-Quibir. Rothwell, for his part, likens Jacinto’s apparent heterosexual “conversion” in A cidade to a “correction” of Dom Sebastião’s “mistake”. However, if the typical messianic allegory rests on an unstable kinship system, Dom Sebastião is, in a sense, set up to “fail”, since the myth produces a normative kinship structure that Eça’s writing calls into question. Working the other way round then, Eça, by writing against the naturalised kinship structure, makes visible rather than conceals the ideology of the myth. In this section, I will first try to read the king’s presence in Basílio as gesturing towards a different national solution beyond the restoration of ancient kinship ties, before I turn again to Os Maias to explore in more detail how patriarchal-capitalist ideology meddles with the passions.

83 “Se D. Sebastião não fosse absoluto, não teria ido enterrar em Alcácer Quibir a nação portuguesa, as últimas esperanças da pátria.” (Emphasis added). See Quental, “Causas da Decadência...”.

84 Rothwell, p. 85.

The reference to Dom Sebastião in Basílio, like in A cidade, seems quite explicit; like the Baron of Lavos, Sebastião shares his name with the king, and even calls his rose collection “rosas D. Sebastião” (91), the blooms of which are gathered for Jorge’s marital preparations. Meanwhile, his intense companionship with Jorge in youth reproduces anxieties surrounding the king’s preference for male company. Curiously, in fact, the figure of the king in Basílio seems to be evoked by both Sebastião and Jorge, those “inseparable” friends who initially form the perfect domestic unit. Indeed, whilst it is Sebastião who most obviously spurns the obligation to wed and father children, Jorge’s decision to marry Luísa and leave the pre-Oedipal home — leaving Lisbon, too, for a lengthy period in the hope of building the family fortune, if eventually returning — resembles the escapades of Dom Sebastião in a different sense. If we draw on the insight of postcolonial theory that overseas territory has historically been characterised as a feminine body to be exploited, crystallised in the Portuguese literary canon with the bountiful rewards of the Ilha dos Amores, parallels emerge between the failed adventures of Jorge with Luísa and those of Dom Sebastião in North Africa.

I would like to propose, therefore, that each character resembles a different permutation of the king: Jorge, the heirless conquistador, and Sebastião, the king who stays at home to tend to his rose garden. Such a fractured rendering of the myth, where the king’s presence is recalled in each of the “inseparable” friends, allows it to be reworked by evoking an alternative history, in contrast to its function in Lavos, for example, where the inscription of the king into one “degenerate” character reaffirms the myth’s normative assumptions. Thus while Jorge suffers consequences for repeating Dom Sebastião’s “mistake” — a fruitless adventure from the “pre-Oedipal” home that leaves his house with no heir — Sebastião’s story in Basílio works to undo the impasse of the Sebastianic myth. He is the character that Eça himself describes as a “bom rapaz”, and the only one to present any degree of consistency in his relations with others. Thus, when Luísa dies, Jorge resumes living with him, recovering his lost comrade. Whilst Jorge’s life is destroyed, however, and his Oedipal identifications lie in tatters, Sebastião is left unharmed, even if he remains childless: the two friends, whose lives run in tandem at first, meet very different fates. Lisboa, drawing on the hostility of the Geração de ‘70 towards the colonial project, argues that, in Os Maias, the central incestuous relationship prompts us to think whether “talvez tivesse sido melhor ter ficado ibericamente em casa”. There are surely traces of this sentiment when we see the consequences that Jorge suffers for his escapades away from home. What the Old Man of Restelo deemed to be “vaidade” and “vã cobiça” in a poem prophetically dedicated to Dom Sebastião himself, finds an echo in Jorge’s vain pursuit of bourgeois marital ideals. As such, the allegory of Dom Sebastião in Basílio may not provide an ostensibly generative solution to the problematic myth, but it does invite the reader to contemplate whether the nation would have been better off had it not been for the expectation, produced by the ruling classes, to leave the domestic and national nest in search of an ultimately deceitful fecundity. Curiously, if we follow this argument, it is the bond between Sebastião and Jorge, interrupted by an inauthentic bourgeois marriage, that signals the return to the home(land) that was always, in the end, desired.

---

85 See A cidade, p. 251-2.

87 Queirós, “Carta a Teófilo Braga”, in Correspondência, p. 51.

Thus whilst in Lavos, normative desire is offered as the only way to rescue the nation (the Baron attempts to rekindle his relationship with his wife as a “remedy” for his ruinous passion for Eugénio), in Basílio, normative desire in fact mobilises the “mistake” that precipitates the end of the family. As with the “amor perfeito” of Carlos and Maria Eduarda, non-normative desire, thrice excluded by Jorge in the form of Sebastião, Basílio and Leopoldina, gestures to a different configuration of kinship that does not so much reflect the nation’s ills as point to their origins in patrilinear modes of forging family and nation, entailing colonial and (later) bourgeois desire, and implicated in the otherwise competing discourses of monarchism and republicanism. The apparent criticism of desire and conquest, of course, arises in the context of the redoubling of Portuguese colonial pursuits in the nineteenth century post Brazilian independence, though this now focussed on Africa, the destination for which Gonçalo claims to depart in Ramires. Eça described the remaining colonies in Africa and Asia as “como velhas salvas de família postas a um canto num armário”, calling for their sale before what he saw to be their inevitable loss to northern Europe. The questioning of the hegemonic family structure can thus be read as a call for the suspension of vain explorations abroad that rekindle dreams of empire, a mode of desire and conquest, perhaps first criticised by Gil Vicente in Auto da Índia, now tragically repeated in the bourgeois family home.

However, the spectre of Dom Sebastião in O primo Basílio does more than question the accepted historical operation of kinship, desire and colonialism. In the previous chapter, I argued that the allegories of nationhood in Lavos constitute a surprising divergence from Naturalist principles by mystifying the layer of signification that, under the inherited model, is expected to denote “reality itself”. The allegorical turn in O primo Basílio performs a similar departure from the Naturalist framework, adjusting the mode of representation to implicate national concerns — the...

---

88 Lisboa, p. 61.

89 “Ó vã cobiça / Desta vaidade, a quem chamamos Fama!” See Luís de Camões, Os Lusíadas (Porto: Porto Editora, 2006), p. 120.

decline of empire — in an otherwise imported discourse. Indeed, Eça writes against nature here in the fullest sense, reconfiguring Naturalism as he gestures towards an alternative mode of being and desiring to change the nation's course. The tragedy of the novel, the scuppering of Jorge's grand plans, revolves around the inability to perceive this gesture due to the historical constraints placed upon desire, which confuse "authentic" relations with the terms and dynamics of a business transaction, investing them with a functional, instrumental purpose.

Desire, kinship and exchange value: a discussion of (homo)erotic triangles

To examine more closely the way in which desire is disrupted in Eça, which throughout I have been intimating to be related to the (re)productive demands of patriarchal capitalism, I would like to return to Os Maias, a novel that has attracted particular attention for its depiction of the degradation of values in capitalist society. Pires de Lima draws on Marx and Lucien Goldmann to argue that relationships in the novel are structured by the pre-eminence of exchange value over use value:

[...] na socialidade capitalista, aquela onde o romance nasceu, o valor de troca ameaça e penetra toda e qualquer relação autêntica. O valor de uso, que preside às relações naturais e sãs entre homens e bens, é mascarado, torna-se implícito e degrada-se.91

In Os Maias, the importance of exchange value disrupts human relations and precipitates a crisis of "ambiguidade moral", entailing a distortion of the value of things, that sends characters along a path from ilusão to desilusão.92 It is this trajectory towards disillusionment that characterises the vencidos da vida, the feeling of hopelessness amongst Eça and his contemporaries after the perceived failure of the grand ambitions of the Geração de '70, thwarted by Portugal's embrace of free market economics following the promising victory of Dom Pedro in the Guerra dos Dois Irmãos. Pires de Lima thus establishes a compelling link between the emergence of a modern capitalist order and the supposed melancholic spirit of Eça’s generation that no longer believed in their capacity to effect change. Maria Manuel Lisboa, meanwhile, draws on Lévi-Strauss, René Girard and Eve Sedgwick to demonstrate how, in Eça, “homosocial” bonds between men are consolidated through the exchange of women in a patrilineal, capitalist order,93 a dynamic we glimpsed, perhaps, in the opening of this chapter, where any potential for homoeroticism at the bathhouse is seemingly disavowed in the bawdy talk between Basílio and Reinaldo that privileges

91 Lima, p. 25.
92 Ibid., p. 42.
93 Lisboa, pp. 227-38.
desire for women. In Os Maias, women become valuable instruments through which men conduct power games between each other. As Irigaray reminds us, “in order for a product – a woman? – to have value, two men, at least, have to invest (in) her”. In this section I aim to demonstrate how, in Os Maias, the “repression of the homosexual into the homosocial”, requiring normative heterosexuality and thus a bond that perpetuates patriarchal power, frequently leads to a calamitous return of that repressed desire, urging a reconsideration of the laws of relationality. In so doing, and as I return to my initial question of Eça’s relationship with the canon and the Naturalist movement, I hope to show how the vanquished spirit of the vencidos da vida allowed non-normative desire to gesture towards a kind of relationality uncorrupted by the relentless incursion of exchange value, only for it, too, to be stifled.

One quite candid reference to “queer” behaviour in Os Maias, which Fernando Curopos mentions in his study of the emergence of homosexuality in nineteenth-century Portuguese literature, demonstrates neatly how exchange value governs and normalises — or tries to govern and normalise — sexual desire. After a cash-strapped Ega dismisses his domestic staff from the opulent, if garish Vila Balzac, he is accused of employing a manservant for sex. The mother of one of the maids arrives with her lover to demand money from Ega, angered that her daughter has eloped with the manservant. Ega initially refuses, though soon concedes:

Ega recusou-se a atender as reclamações da matrona. Que diabo tinha ele com essas torpezas?

Então o amante da criatura interveio, ameaçadoramente. Era um polícia, um esteio da ordem: e deu a entender que lhe seria fácil provar como na Vila Balzac se passavam “coisas contra a Natureza”, e que o pajem não era só para servir à mesa... Nauseado até à morte, Ega pactuou com a intrujice. (p. 289)

The allusion to sodomy in the phrase “coisas contra a natureza” – incidentally, the exact phrasing of Portugal's anti-sodomy clause from 1912, appropriated strategically in this thesis – leaves Ega sickened and mortified. He pays off the policeman handsomely, landing himself in significant debt. Lisboa argues that the women in Os Maias function in Irigarayan terms as a “moeda corrente”, Ega later offering Carlos the possibility of an affair with the Condessa de Gouvarinho in a tacitly acknowledged exchange for money to alleviate financial difficulties. This is the second half of the story, however, since Ega is only in such dire financial straits at this point because of the unexpected costs of leaving the Vila Balzac. Left out of pocket by even a whiff of “unnatural” activity, he offers a woman to Carlos to pay his way out of bankruptcy. As we shall see, in Os Maias, whilst relations with women offer men capital gains, “coisas contra a natureza” signal the opposite.

---

94 Irigaray, p. 181.

97 Lisboa, p. 234.

Earlier, I referred to a parallel between Carlos’ relationship with Dâmaso and Pedro’s with Tancredo in Os Maias. Pedro, in idolising Tancredo (an erotically charged idolatry, as we have seen) is likened to Dâmaso, who idolises Carlos in a similar manner. The relations can of course be considered triangular, involving “mimetic” desire as theorised by René Girard in Deceit, Desire and the Novel, a schema that we saw disrupted in O Barão de Lavos, in which Elvira herself becomes the rival. In Os Maias, Pedro and Tancredo are placed in rivalry over Maria Monforte, and Carlos and Dâmaso over her daughter, Maria Eduarda. In this case, the triangulation is disrupted by the unacknowledged, excess desire that spills over into the nominally social bond between the men. I infer that there is a parallel between these triangles because father and son (Pedro and Carlos) both fall victim to the corruption of male friendship, even when occupying opposing positions of power. Pedro da Maia is likened not to Carlos but to Dâmaso who, like Cohen, Gouvarinho and countless others, lets himself be used by a rival whom he perceives to be a friend. As we have seen, Pedro considers Tancredo to be an “irmão de armas”, having invited him into his home to convalesce. He is evidently motivated in part by a desire for — an eroticised idolisation of — Tancredo. But Tancredo has quite different ideas, eloping with Maria Monforte and leaving Pedro alone in Lisbon with (baby) Carlos. By “losing” the game of the erotic triangle, in which patriarchal power is negotiated through the exchange of women, Pedro sets in motion the demise of his family line. To begin with, he spends too much time with Tancredo, neglecting his wife:

Agora logo de manhã, [Pedro] subia para o quarto do príncipe [Tancredo], de robe-de-chambre e cachimbo na boca, e passava lá horas numa camaradagem, fazendo grogues quentes […]. Maria sentia-lhe por cima as risadas. Às vezes tocava-se viola. […] Maria, por fim, perguntou a Pedro, muito séria, se além de todos os amigos da casa, duas enfermeiras, dois escudeiros, o papá e ele Pedro – era necessária também constantemente a sua própria criada no quarto de Sua Alteza!

Não era. Mas Pedro riu muito à ideia de que a arlesiana se tivesse namorado do príncipe. Nesse caso Vénus era-lhe propícia! O napolitano também a achava picante: un très joli brin de femme, tinha ele dito.

A bela face de Maria empalideceu de cólera. Julgava tudo isso de mau gosto, grosseiro, impudente! (p. 41)
Maria's exclusion and loneliness are all the more pronounced when she hears the jovialities in the rooms above her. Pedro, besotted with Tancredo and spending hours with him smoking in his pyjamas, ignores his wife's needs, enraging her. Her carefully worded, pointed jibe of “Sua Alteza”, which she asks “muito séria” but not without exasperation, suggests she has brooded considerably on her husband’s adoration of his “belo principe”. It is little wonder, perhaps, that she elopes with the Neapolitan prince. Pedro’s “mistake” is to cultivate a bond with Tancredo so strong that it is no longer “homosocial”, no longer negotiated through a woman: so much desire spills over along the underside of the triangle, towards Tancredo — and indeed away from Maria, judging by her loneliness — that Tancredo can poach his wife before his eyes. Tancredo, for his part, plays the game much more effectively, his attachment to Pedro only ever serving him insofar as it affords him access to Maria Monforte. As soon as he has conquered her favour, the two depart, never to be seen again in Lisbon. In other words, his bond with Pedro is matched and measured by a heterosexual attachment to Maria, creating an asymmetry with his “camarada”, who allows his infatuation with Tancredo to go unchecked. He is thus outmanoeuvred by his “friend”, leading to his suicide and the eventual dwindling of the Maia line. In a society that markets women as objects of exchange in order to establish (re)productive bonds of competition and camaraderie between men, desire between men must be measured in accordance with sexual desire for women. When the erotic creeps into the ostensibly “homosocial”, the power structure that holds two men in a position of rivalry becomes asymmetrical and destined for treacheries.

A generation later, Carlos appears to find himself in the reverse role to his father. Indeed, as Pires de Lima notes, Carlos has been educated in the latest ideas and appears, at least upon his arrival in Lisbon, as “um ser de excepção no meio português, mesmo dentro da classe a que pertence”. He seems to be the perfect antidote to his weak and mollycoddled father: strong, virile, with his celebrated good looks, good sense and good taste, “tudo parece perfeito: formação excepcional – vontade de agir”. He is something of a Sebastianic figure himself, returning to Lisbon to restore the viability of family and nation, with all his grand plans for cultural expansion, a kind of Pessoan Fifth Empire avant la lèttre. Upon the Maias’ return to Lisbon after years of Afonso’s self-exile in Santa Olávia, he appears to have overcome his father’s “weaknesses”, proving adept at playing the love triangle through his adventures first in Coimbra and later, back in Lisbon, with the Viscondessa de Gouvarinho, which Ega, and to a lesser extent Carlos, orchestrate

---

98 Lima, p. 65.
99 Ibid., p. 67.
100 Incidentally, there are several similarities between character and king. Both Carlos and Dom Sebastião lost their fathers at a very young age (in the monarch’s case, eighteen days before he was born) and were abandoned by their mothers: Carlos, when Monforte elopes with Tancredo, and Sebastião when his mother Joanna of Austria, shortly after his birth, was called to Madrid to become queen regent of Spain. Both Carlos and Sebastião, furthermore, were raised by grandparents. See http://www.arqnet.pt/dicionario/sebastiao1rei.html (accessed 1/4/16).
to make a fool of her husband.\textsuperscript{101} His conquest of Maria Eduarda, who at the time is believed to be Madame Castro Gomes, much coveted by D\textasciitilde maso, is equally successful. Carlos plainly uses D\textasciitilde maso to gain access to Maria Eduarda, a tactic seen already at their first meeting, in which D\textasciitilde maso, having fixed his eyes longingly on Carlos, reveals his intimacy with Maria and her “husband”:

— Bem sei! Os Castro Gomes... Conhe\c{c}o-os muito... Vim com eles de Bord\'{e}us... Uma gente muito chique que vive em Paris.

Carlos voltou-se, reparou mais nele, perguntou-lhe, af\'{a}vel e interessando-se:
— O Sr. Salcede chegou agora de Bord\'{e}us?

Estas palavras pareceram deleitar D\textasciitilde maso como um favor celeste (p. 158)

Carlos only notices D\textasciitilde maso, becomes “af\'{a}vel” towards and interested in him, after D\textasciitilde maso has spoken of Maria. As with Tancredo, Carlos’ interest in D\textasciitilde maso is neatly matched to his desire for her. D\textasciitilde maso, meanwhile, is delighted by Carlos’ interest in him, and henceforth uses Maria as bait with which to attach himself to Carlos. Indeed, his “romance divino” (p. 211) with her turns out to be “fictício”,\textsuperscript{102} a fabrication designed to provoke Carlos’ jealousy and dependency upon him. D\textasciitilde maso demonstrates a primary interest in Carlos, whereas Carlos only expresses interest in D\textasciitilde maso insofar as he dangles the real carrot of Maria Eduarda. The asymmetry in their relationship is uncannily similar to that of Pedro da Maia and Tancredo, Carlos now occupying the equivalent position of the Neapolitan prince. A period of triumph follows for him; he appears, at least, to have corrected his father's “mistake”.

D\textasciitilde maso, however, will not be defeated so easily, beginning his revenge by denigrating Carlos' name around Lisbon. Ega summarises his story:

É a velha hist\'{o}ria; diz que te apresentou, que te meteste de dentro, e como para essa senhora é uma quest\'{a}o de dinheiro, e tu és o mais rico, ela lhe passou o pé... Vês daí a infamiazinha.

(p. 422)

Remarking that it was he who introduced Carlos to Maria, D\textasciitilde maso appears to feel used by Carlos: rather than treating him as a friend, or even as an enemy, Carlos uses D\textasciitilde maso’s idolisation of him to facilitate the exchange of Maria Eduarda, just as Tancredo does earlier with his father. D\textasciitilde maso furthers his vengeance with a slanderous article in a newspaper, but his final blow in fact comes from his uncle, Guimar\'{a}es who, seemingly by chance, the night before his departure to Paris, \textsuperscript{101} Lisboa, p. 217.

\textsuperscript{102} Ibid., p. 211.
reveals to Ega the incestuous nature of Carlos' affair with Maria Eduarda. Ega, horrified, is quick to blame Guimarães for the revelation and wishes he had never appeared:

E esta confusão, esta ansiedade, ia-se resolvendo lentamente em ódio ao Sr. Guimarães. Para que falara aquele imbecil? Para que insistira em lhe confiar papéis alheios? Para que lho apresentava o Alencar? Ah! se não fosse a carta do Dâmaso... Tudo provinha do maldito Dâmaso! (p. 625)

_Tudo provinha do maldito Dâmaso._ In the end, Guimarães only meets Carlos and Ega because of his disapproval of his nephew's humiliation in the Lisbon press. The secret of Carlos and Maria's consanguinity is only ever "outed" because of Dâmaso's wrath at Carlos' valuation of him as a means to an end. Carlos, even when in the seemingly advantageous position in the love triangle, is nonetheless brought down by his (mis)use of Dâmaso's attachment. Carlos cannot redeem his father's sins because he too falls victim, despite his initial appearance as "um ser de excepção", to a culture of exchange value that endows desire with the functional, instrumentalist purpose of (re)production. Carlos spurns Dâmaso's love ("chegou a odiá-lo" [p. 189]) unless it can serve, at some level at least, the advancement of his kin.

Carlos, therefore, cannot correct his father's "mistake" (or indeed Dom Sebastião's): even after his "perfect" English education, virility, and lively interest in women, his life choices will leave him bereft of a satisfying future, just as he leaves his homeland bereft of him. By privileging normative desire, a feat that his father could not quite manage, he is brought down by what he has excluded to do so. Indeed, _Os Maias_ concludes after the letter confirming Carlos and Maria's consanguinity literally arrives at its destination, and thus when all the repressed elements that allow their relationship to develop and function as an ostensibly perfect love affair over the course of the novel return with a vengeance.\(^{103}\) Implicating the dominant culture of exchange value in the problematic operation of desire, Eça tentatively offers non-normative desire — as in the case of Jorge and Sebastião in _Basilio_ — as that which resists assimilation into patriarchal-capitalist structures of power, and which, furthermore, returns to undo these. Phillip Rothwell ultimately arrives at a similar conclusion when he argues that it is Afonso da Maia's endorsement of capitalism as the antidote to the nation's ills, after his initial revolutionary spirit, that leads to his family's demise: "as is invariably the case when the antidoting system is one based on capitalism, the antidote itself transforms into a symptom".\(^ {104}\) It is Afonso, indeed, who instills the culture of exchange value in his grandson with his liberal, English education. Carlos’ transformation into a symptom of the system that he at first seems to have the power to change, reproducing a culture of exchange value that “corrupts” his relations with others, suggests a pressing need to reassess the social-sexual code.

---

\(^{103}\) See Lisboa, pp. 117-31 for a reading of Maria Eduarda as the return of the repressed mother.

\(^{104}\) Rothwell, p. 74.

Eça’s thus problematises the constraints placed on desire in patriarchal society. Desire can only find acceptable expression when it promotes the perpetuation of patriarchal power and property: ownership of women, sons, and capital. To violate the sexual code is to lose the power of exchange, and yet in Eça, the normative route ultimately proves equally fruitless and probably more painful. Despite what are occasionally offered as ideal relationships in Eça — Carlos and Maria, Sebastião and Jorge — the interference of economics proves too strong to resist. We have returned, indeed, to Lisboa’s assertion that the desilusão in Os Maias stems not so much from the revelation of kinship trouble as it does the reassertion of normative kinship. As Valério, Pires de Lima, and other critics have suggested, Os Maias represents the spirit of vencidismo in its most complete form, an “incapacidade em levar à prática” the great plans of youth, a spirit that Eça, despairing of its careless appropriation by the press, defined in the following terms:

para um homem, o ser vencido ou derrotado na vida depende, não da realidade aparente a que chegou — mas do ideal íntimo a que aspirava.106

The individual’s most intimate, valued beliefs, in other words, are unable to be reconciled with the demands of social life. In this context, it seems fitting that an unacknowledged, non-normative desire — incestuous or otherwise “queer” — emerges as an apparently redemptive counterpoint to the pressures of capitalist economics only for it, too, to be quashed.

However, the transformation from Geração de ’70 to vencidos da vida was also motivated, in Eça’s case in particular, by a loss of confidence in the epistemological and reformist potential of Naturalist movement. Eça was flummoxed and frustrated by the silence in the immediate aftermath of the publication of his first major novel, O crime do Padre Amaro, for example, and with the publication of Os Maias in 1888, his early revolutionary fervour is reduced to satire in the naive João da Ega.108 Lisboa’s reading of Os Maias elicits how Eça draws on Greek tragedy to undo the principles of Naturalism, replacing the logic of determinism with pre-determination and introducing an apparently chance moment of anagnorisis — a half-forgotten old box of cigars — to 108 Ega’s similarity to the author (orthographically, a mere pen-stroke) has long been suggested by critics. See e.g. Antero Vieira de Lemos, Eça de Queiroz, o seu drama e a sua obra (Porto: Edição do Autor, 1945), p. 202. See also Valério, p. 30.

---

refute grandiose Naturalist claims to absolute truth. Fate comes to trump, in the end, the illuminative efforts of science. Interestingly, references to Greek notions of beauty and friendship also disrupt republican, bourgeois understandings of these and play a role in their eventual unravelling. Allegories of nationhood, too, alter the register in which the Naturalist writer supposedly articulates social commentary. The interruption of Naturalist discourse with older modes of representing being and desiring, undoing its lofty epistemological claims in vencidista spirit, thus also returns us to questions of the Naturalist movement, literary marginality, and the canon. Jobst Welge contends that Os Maias is a “genealogical fiction” whose concern with family breakdown reflects a society on the periphery of the dominant culture. It is surely inviting to think of Portugal’s marginal position as having contributed to the author’s troubling of desire and kinship to critique imported notions of literary-scientific “truth” and free-market economics. This is the question I would now like to address, tying together my claims in this chapter with a reading of another preeminent novel by Eça that I have not yet explored, A reliquia.

_Penso eu e pensa meu cunhado Crispim: slaying God, man and the canon in A reliquia_

Published in 1887, written in Portugal during the same period as Os Maias and causing the author notorious difficulties and frustration, A reliquia is in many ways the most puzzling of Eça’s novels, adhering little to any literary style, blending realism, fantasy and dubious first-person narration. Oliveira Martins’ praise for the novel — the only one the author submitted, unsuccessfully, for a prize — goes some way towards illustrating its eclectic texture:

A reliquia é o pandemónio mais incongruente, mais extravagante, mais inconcebível que se pode imaginar. Desde a farsa até à epopeia; desde a gargalhada, pelo sorriso, até ao patético mais puro; desde a aventura picaresca até aos episódios sublimes; desde a anedota do bacharel em viagem até ao quadro nobremente sereno da vida antiga; desde a troça desenfreada, até à história severa; desde a pochade grotesca, até à paisagem larga e

---

109 Lisboa, pp. 382-93.

111 Interestingly, Maria Filomena Mónica points out that Eça never managed to write well in Portugal, and spent weeks travelling around the country with Ramalho Ortigão looking for “um sítio limpo de massadores, de moscas e de cozinheiros, para acabar de escrever A reliquia”. The very process of writing in his peripheral country (as opposed to France and Britain, where he wrote most of his work) seemed to impede carefull Naturalist study. See _Eça de Queirós_ (Braga: Quetzal, 2001), p. 202.

112 See Mónica, pp. 206-9.
Há de tudo neste livro. The epigraph of the novel has become one of Eça’s most famous lines — “[s]obre a nudez forte da verdade, o manto diáfano da fantasia” — inscribed onto his statue on the Rua das Flores in Lisbon, and signalling the novel’s interweaving of realism and fantasy. However, there is a significant dimension of A reliquia that, to my knowledge, has not been critically explored, and yet surfaces in the first line of the prologue: meu cunhado Crispim. The narrator’s relationship with Crispim, who begins the novel as his schoolboy lover and ends it as his brother-in-law, has not been read as significantly relevant to the novel’s structure, inferred instead to be an illuminating reflection of the author’s life. Coleman, for example, who describes Crispim simply as “an old schoolmate”, draws on Coimbra Martins to argue that Teodorico’s marriage to Crispim’s sister at the end has “glaring and instructive parallels” with the author’s marriage to Emília de Resende. Whilst I do not mean to refute or confirm these speculations surrounding Eça’s personal life, I do wish to “queer” the narrator’s relationship with Crispim and restore its deceptively peripheral position to the centre of the novel’s ideological concerns. As we shall see, the renunciation of illicit love in favour of patriarchal marriage echoes the vencidista trajectory of characters such as Jorge, but in A reliquia, the use of first-person narration allows non-normative desire to haunt the act of writing the story, rather like in the later A cidade e as serras, but more pointedly bound up with epistemological questions and the refutation of positivist claims to truth. Indeed, as I shall argue, Teodorico’s eventual acceptance of the homosocial pact is the manifestation par excellence of his convictions surrounding the arbitrary nature of signification. By questioning God, the Father’s Name and the act of representation itself, A reliquia seems to position itself as far as possible from the principles of Naturalism, anticipating, as Frank de Sousa has argued, the spirit of modernism (or even post-modernism), and troubling kinship and “truth” in the same move.

A reliquia is the story of Teodorico Raposo, an alentejano orphaned at a young age and sent to live with his rich and draconian aunt, Titi Patrocínio das Neves. Titi is staunchly religious, believing nature to be “quase obscena por ter criado dois sexos” (p. 37) and forbidding any activity 114 See also Ernesto Guerra da Cal, A reliquia, romance picaresco e cervantesco (Lourenço Marques: Sociedade de Estudos de Moçambique, 1972) for an exploration of the eclectic nature of A reliquia.

---

115 Coleman, p. 176.
116 Ibid., p. 181.
that might be construed as “andar atrás de saias”. Teodorico, coveting her vast fortune, leads a double life, touring churches to appear devout on the one hand, and seeking passionate love affairs on the other. To complete his education, Titi sends him on a voyage to the Holy Land on her behalf, asking him to return with a sacred relic. Teodorico proves an indulgent, ignorant and irreverent traveller, falling in love with a British girl named Mary in Alexandria, who leaves him her unwashed petticoats as a titillating memento. Continuing onto Jerusalem with his companion, the German historian Topsius, Teodorico “wakes up” to find himself at the time of Jesus, where he witnesses the latter’s trial and crucifixion under Pontus Pilate, though almost missing both in order to smoke a cigarette and “ir lá abaixo às mulherinhas” (p. 187). On his journey home, he finds a thorny branch which he resolves to present to Titi as having sprouted from the same tree as the crown of thorns worn at the crucifixion. Finally, returning to Lisbon, he reveals the relic to Titi, but unforgivably mixes up his parcels, unwrapping, instead, Mary’s petticoats. Disowned and disinherited, Teodorico must abandon his plans for aristocratic ascendency, opting instead to sell sham relics to devout lisboetas before joining his friend Crispim’s firm and marrying his sister, affording him a life of respectable bourgeois comforts.

In his closing lines, Teodorico finally offers readers his (and importantly, as we shall see, Crispim’s) “lição lúcida e forte” (p. 5) that he promises at the beginning of his monograph: the need for a “descarado heroísmo de afirmar” (p. 275). Learning the (exchange) value of “relics” — more still, the false foundations of Christianity, since the dream chapter implies that the crucifixion was staged to allow for the “resurrection” — Teodorico claims that his greatest error was, in the end, not to have alleged to Titi that the fateful lingerie was no less than a gift from Mary Magdalene in the desert. This courage to affirm, or indeed lie, is, according to Teodorico, what creates the “universal ilusão” sustaining “ciências e ilusões” (p. 275). Critics have long argued that this “lição” is the culmination of Eça’s disillusionsment with Naturalist thought. Mónica argues that “[a] moral de A reliquia não podia ser mais cínica”;¹¹⁸ for Coleman, the novel is a “strategic ideological retreat” from the author’s earlier, more pointedly Naturalist works.¹¹⁹ Lisboa reads the novel as an undoing of religious and cultural history, a “pseudocruzada supostamente santa”,¹²⁰ working to strip the nation of its mythologised, grandiose past to leave little more than “roupagens mais cómodas, mais caseiras”, the “bom burguês, feliz de regresso à sua lareira após jornadas tormentosas por mares já dantes navegados”.¹²¹ She compares this sentiment to that expressed in Fukuyama’s rather ominous proclamation of the “end of history” and “victory” of Western values after the fall of the ¹¹⁸ Mónica, p. 206.

¹¹⁹ Coleman, p. 167.
¹²¹ Ibid., p. 163.
Soviet Union. Such comparisons with more recent times seem especially apt for a work that appears to deny any coherent reason to the relationship between signifier and signified, so much so that a severed branch can lay claim to being the crown of thorns, and a stained petticoat an image of chastity and devotion. In a sense, the true relic of A reliquia — that which remains from the rubbish heap of history — is the empty signifier itself, now ripe for conversion to exchange value in a burgeoning capitalist order. It was not until the twentieth century that Saussure argued that the formation of the sign was arbitrary, an insight more easily squared with writers such as Saramago than with the great Naturalist works of the nineteenth century, though Machado de Assis’ Dom Casmurro tackles similar epistemological questions from the other side of the Atlantic. Eça’s troubling of Naturalist claims to truth surely reaches its apex in A reliquia and arguably — again in the spirit of the end of history — cannot go any further other than to accept, without enthusiasm, the disintegration of all cultural values save the power of exchange.

It is in this context of undoing Naturalist principles at their very core, by questioning the bond between signifier and signified, indeed the viability of literary mimesis, that I would like to turn to the relationship that runs parallel to the narrator’s trajectory from heir apparent to successful, if conventional and unremarkable, bourgeois patriarch. Teodorico first meets Crispim at school; he is the son of the owners of a thread factory, and thus clearly marked as a member of the ascendent mercantile classes:

> Logo nas primeiras semanas liguei-me ternamente com um rapaz Crispim, mais crescido que eu, filho da firma Teles, Crispim & C.ª, donos da fábrica de fiação à Pampulha. O Crispim ajudava à missa aos domingos; e, de joelhos, com os seus cabelos compridos e louros, lembrava a suavidade de um anjo. Às vezes agarrava-me no corredor e marcava-me a face, que eu tinha feminina e macia, com beijos devoradores; à noite, na sala de estudo, à mesa onde folheávamos os sonolentos dicionários, passava-me bilhetinhos a lápis, chamando-me seu idolatrado e prometendo-me caixinhas de penas de aço… (p. 18).

The instant attraction (“logo nas primeiras semanas”) leads to a tender relationship that endures for several years. Despite seeming to find him angelically attractive, it is difficult to ascertain how much Teodorico reciprocates Crispim’s behaviour: although he claims to be kissed rather than kiss, and receive notes rather than write them, he is rather laconic, ending here on an ellipsis, and writing as an older man and father. Interestingly, at school, another classmate calls Teodorico

---

124 See Machado de Assis, Joaquim, Dom Casmurro (Lisboa: Guerra e Paz, 2016), where a definitive answer to the question of Capitu’s faithfulness to the narrator is withheld throughout.
"lambisgóia", a remarkably feminising insult probably related to lamber. His reaction is to assault him in the toilets, bloodying his face "com um murro bestial", an act which Teodorico claims to leave him "temido" thereafter (p. 21), and which seems at odds with his otherwise placid temperament. He wishes to cultivate an image of masculinity, no doubt, but his feminine features and his older friend’s propensity to kiss him in the corridors complicates the task. It is not known whether or not the insult is related to Teodorico’s relations with Crispim, but his phobic aversion to his friend’s advances are at least as apparent as his attraction towards them, foreshadowing his trajectory as an adult.

Crispim then disappears from the narrative until the very end, although in the Holy Land, despite granting his affair with Mary the greatest importance, Teodorico continues to display attraction to men, often referring casually to their beauty. This occurs particularly — and significantly — in the dream chapter, dreams being, for Freud, the “blessed fulfillers of our wishes” revealing otherwise “latent thoughts". Consider, for example, Teodorico’s sighting of "um homem formoso” (p. 143), to whom he refers thereafter as “o formoso Manassés” (pp. 144, 153). Later, in a similar manner, he notices “um moço formoso” next to him in the crowd (p. 196). On arriving in Palestine, too, he remarks upon the Arab muleteer, “tão airoso e lindo que eu” (p. 88); “o nosso lindo arrieiro” (p. 113). Even his descriptions of the encyclopaedic Topsius sometimes distantly eroticise his figure in the dream sequence, with his “lábios que pareciam clássicos e de mármore” suggesting an “irresistível intelectualidade” (pp. 122-3). Teodorico watches him “submissamente, como perante um mandamento celeste”, left to “enfiar em silêncio as grossas botas de montar.” Fascinated with what he perceives to be his companion’s irresistible intellectuality, when in fact Topsius is closer to a charlatan, Teodorico, as observed elsewhere in Eça, likens him to a classical figure with lips of marble, a godlike, celestial being inducing silent submission. As we shall see, Teodorico will later seek out this superficial bookishness in his wife. Despite such relationships in his youth, however, it is Mary who is most consciously recalled, being for Teodorico, “talvez, em toda a vasta terra, o único coração em que o meu poderia repousar” (p. 232).

In apparently privileging normative desire at the level of consciousness, Teodorico sets the stage for his entry into the homosocial pact at the end of the novel. Shortly after his return to Lisbon, he has a chance encounter with Crispim in the gardens of São Pedro de Alcântara, who upon hearing his friend’s travails offers him a job at his firm. Times have changed, however: Crispim remarks that Teodorico is “muitíssimo feio” (p. 268), and the latter, from hereon in, remarkably refers to his friend as “Crispim & C.a”, or even “a firma” (p. 269), a decidedly colder reincarnation of the Sociedade Sebastião e Jorge. With this nominal shift, in accordance with the novel’s repeated emptying of signifiers, Crispim undergoes a conversion from a dear schoolfriend to a name on the stock exchange and provider of “o queijo” (p. 269). Finally, to complete the transaction and partnership, he offers Teodorico his sister in marriage and a stake in the firm. Dona Jesuína is perhaps the least appetising woman he encounters throughout the novel: "chamava-se D. Jesuína, tinha trinta e dois anos e era zarolha, [de] pele cor de maçã madura" (p. 271). However, besides being Crispim’s sister, other, seemingly bizarre attributes appear to interest Teodorico. Firstly, he admires her “peito sólido e suculento”, suculentos being used to describe Mary’s cheeks when the pair first meet (p. 74). He also perceives her to be well educated: “sabia geografia e todos os rios da China, sabia história e todos os reis da França” — rather like the historian Topsius, his idolised model of intellectuality. Lastly, he admires her cookery skills and ability to consolidate his sense of masculinity: “fazia um prato de ovos queimados: e o seu olho vesgo pousava, com incessante agrado, na minha face potente e barbuda de Raposão”. The egg desserts no doubt remind him of those that he brings to Adélia, his first lover (p. 39).

---

125 See http://www.dicionarioweb.com.br/lambisgoia/ (accessed 15/05/16).

Jesuína is perceived and represented, in other words, as little more than a mélange of earlier characters’ peculiarities who variously heighten Teodorico’s sense of virility. Significantly, Teodorico’s mother dies giving birth to him (p. 12), leaving him with no image to influence his future (Oedipal) object choice. It is therefore precisely Jesuína’s ambiguous presentation that enables Teodorico to accept her as a bride, despite admitting that his inclinations towards her are loveless (p. 272). As a sufficiently empty signifier in her own right, Jesuína can stand in for Crispim, Topsius, Adélia and Mary, all former lovers in their own way, conjoined in a passably feminine body. Thus her gender is subtly clouded with ambiguity in speech: “acho-a um belo mulherão; gosto-lhe muito do dote; e havia de ser um bom marido”. The use of the augmentative masculinises her, while the absence of a pronoun in the final clause allows her, in theory at least, to take the syntactic position of the “bom marido”. The marriage is then sealed with a warm handshake between Teodorico and “a firma”, completing the homosocial pact. Crispim and Jesuína, then, are both ultimately related to in terms of their exchange value, the former as quite literally a brand, the creator of capital, and the latter as the means to that end, the moeda corrente, a body empty and unremarkable enough to figure as anything at all, if one has but the descarado heroísmo de afirmar.

The kind of love that Teodorico accepts at the end of A reliquia is thus the perfect expression of both the culture of exchange value and the loss of meaning in the wake of the death of God.

Aren’t we straying as through an infinite nothing? Isn’t empty space breathing at us? Hasn’t it got colder? Isn’t night and more night coming again and again?127

---

In a world of such eroded values as that of A reliquia, where love and the individual are vanquished by the emptying power of exchange, it is difficult to imagine how more “authentic” values might ever be recovered. Nietzsche’s words, indeed, recall the closing image of Os Maias, the rising moonlight above Lisbon signalling an eternal night lit only dimly amid events that have “unchained this earth from its sun”. Have we arrived once more at the end of history or, perhaps, the end of the love story? Jesuína’s gift of the “última rosa do verão” (p. 271) seems significant in this respect. It is the last expression of love that will ever bloom for man; “love” will forever flower in this spurious form.

The need to accept this form of love, the last rose of summer, which is also to understand the invincible meaninglessness of capitalist society, is the crux of Teodorico’s disquieting “lição”, a lesson shared, of course, by Crispim, as confirmed in the opening sentence of the text:

Decidi compor, nos vagares deste verão, na minha quinta do Mosteiro (antigo solar dos condes de Lindoso), as memórias da minha vida — que neste século, tão consumido pelas incertezas da inteligência e tão angustiado pelos tormentos do dinheiro, encerra, penso eu e pensa meu cunhado Crispim, uma lição lúcida e forte. (p. 5, emphasis added)

Teodorico clearly locates his pessimistic “lição” within the confines of the nineteenth century and its tempestuous obsession with both capital and post-Enlightenment claims to truth, now troubled by growing “incertezas” in the fin de siècle. However, in claiming that his “lição” is not just his but Crispim’s, Teodorico makes A reliquia the literary child of their homosocial pact, a surrender to meaninglessness born of a post-Oedipal exclusion of all values and sentiments resistant to the power of exchange. The very act of writing forges a homosocial bond, confirming the hegemony of heterosexuality. Famously asking whether the pen is a “metaphorical penis”, Gilbert and Gubar contend that patriarchal ideology renders artistic creativity a predominantly masculine quality that, in its turn, works to cement the patriarchal order. A reliquia, with its first-person narrator who ultimately accepts this order, assimilating his first lover to the position of brother-in-law and co-author, links the consolidation of normative sexuality and patriarchy to the revelation of “truth” by man, once assured by an omniscient God, but now devoid of meaning — in the bourgeois, Western world at least — after His death, in spite of attempts by Eça and his generation to resurrect it. If the pen is indeed a metaphorical penis, A reliquia details how that pen, perhaps in place of the penis, reaches the man’s hand over the course and at the end of history, darkening his vision. Thus all that Teodorico receives from his Aunt’s testament are her tinted spectacles, “para ver o resto de longe” (p. 262), to look askance at what he has lost.

---

128 Ibid., p. 120.

If the work of Eça de Queirós in general, and Os Maias in particular, troubles the foundations of the kinship system to reveal an excess that is denied and yet exploited for personal gain, A reliquia exposes how this excess is complicit with the act of writing itself. Teodorico’s story and “lição” rest on a homosocial pact that b(l)inds him to the assumptions of the patriarchal kinship system, his identification as a father resting on nothing but a chain of empty signifiers. The novel explores the great ideological blindspots of Eça’s “scientific” age, a crisis of representation calling for dubious first-person narration and the dreamlike “manto diáfano da fantasia”, a disruption to Naturalist discourse that echoes the return to the Greek classics in Os Maias. I would now like to turn briefly to Eça’s short story “José Matias” which, I believe, takes these blindspots as its chief epistemological focus. Published in 1897 after both O Barão de Lavos and Bom Crioulo, “José Matias”, again written in the first person, is a philosopher’s tale of his incomprehension at the story’s eponymous subject, narrated to an acquaintance at his funeral. In the spirit of courtly love, José spends his life in silent adoration for the “divina Elisa”, a beautiful married woman who twice spurns him for other admirers, leading to José’s premature death from spiralling alcoholism and financial ruin — rather like the Baron of Lavos, to whom I will return shortly. The narrator is baffled by José’s capacity for self-destruction, calling him an “espírito curioso” who leaves him with more questions than answers; at the end, he defines him as “talvez muito mais que um homem — or talvez ainda menos que um homem” (p. 508). Quite what constitutes the great “mystery” of José’s character is not named or revealed, despite, as Cleonice Berardinelli notes, consistent attempts by critics to identify “it” amid more than twenty “expressões de dúvida” and seventy-five ellipses. More recently, Ana Paula Ferreira has proposed that Matias is a feminised figure, given to sentimentality and aesthetic beauty and thus coded as sexually non-normative, whom the narrator in vain “wills to know” with his positivist philosophy, echoing the “homosexual panic” of the fin de siècle. Sexuality in the story, in other words, is bound up with epistemological questions and the revelation (or complication) of truth. However, in the light of my reading of A reliquia, I would like to shift the focus of “queerness” away from José and onto the narrator himself who, like Teodorico at the end of his story, sees only normative desire, but appears to harbour an interest in José himself, allowing for a more sinister reading of his character that again relates writing and truth to the suppression of non-normative desire.

11-23.

references are to this edition.

133 Ferreira, pp. 327-337.
“Um rapaz airoso, louro como uma espiga, com um bigode crespo de paladino sobre uma boca indecisa de contemplativo, destro cavaleiro, duma elegância sóbria e fina” (p. 481). The narrator’s initial description of his subject, “um moço interessante”, “um suave camarada”, “[um] moço tão macio, tão louro e tão ligeiro”, is, importantly, physically flattering and curious, but not clearly erotic, echoing many other moments across Eça’s work that allow for the possibility of physical attraction — the narrator also describes Elisa’s new lover as a “belo moço, rígido” (p. 502) — without any move towards confirmation. However, some minor but structurally important details suggest that the narrator is in a much greater position of power than he prefers to admit. To begin with, he seems implicated in José’s decision to retreat to Porto, out of respect for Elisa when her husband dies, which thwarts the first of two opportunities for José to declare his love legitimately:

O José Matias abalava nessa noite para o Porto. […] Num momento em que ele entrara na alcova, murmurei ao Nicolau, por cima do grogue: — “O Matias faz perfeitamente em ir para o Porto…” Nicolau encolheu os ombros: — “Sim, pensou que era mais delicado… Eu aprovei. Mas só durante os meses de luto pesado…” (pp. 490-1)

Why does the narrator mutter his advice to his friend when José leaves the room? We can only surmise that he wishes to keep his designs (desires?) for José a secret. It is curious that José misses two golden opportunities to propose to the widowed Elisa because of his prolonged absence in Porto, apparently encouraged by the narrator, and despite his (public) profession to see José married to Elisa. Secondly, the narrator’s panic to analyse and explain is sometimes inflected with the language of sexual dominance. The following passage relates his consternation on learning of Elisa’s second marriage to the wealthy Torres Nogueira, apparently because of José’s refusal to see her when in Porto:

Ambos nos olhámos, e depois ambos nos separámos, encolhendo os ombros, com aquele assombro resignado que convém a espíritos prudentes perante o Incognoscível. Mas eu, Filósofo, e portanto espírito imprudente, toda essa noite esturaquei o ato do José Matias com a ponta duma Psicologia que expressamente aguçara: — e já de madrugada, estafado, concluí, como se conclui sempre em Filosofia, que me encontrava diante duma Causa Primária, portanto impenetrável, onde se quebraria, sem vantagem para ele, para mim, ou para o Mundo, a ponta do meu Instrumento! (p. 494, emphasis added).

The narrator spends the night attempting to penetrate the mystery of José Matias with the point of his instrument. So developed is the metaphor linking the desire to know to the act of penetration — strikingly similar to that used in Zola’s surgically-inspired preface to Thérèse Raquin that became something of a Naturalist manifesto — that it pre-empts Gilbert and Gubar’s description of the pen as a metaphorical penis. “José Matias” is, in one sense, the story of how the replacement of the penis with the pen leads to the ink running dry — or, more formally speaking, an epistemological crisis, in which the narrator tries to enunciate his subject’s “secrets” without, apparently, apprehending the hidden ideological assumptions of the supposedly clarifying enunciative act.

Although, according to Christian tradition, Cain kills Abel because God favours the latter’s sacrificial offering, the scriptural history of the original Biblical kinslaying is more complex, and in Islamic and several early Judaic texts, each brother is born with a twin sister, destined in marriage for the other brother so as to avoid incest. Cain’s fratricide, by which he means to keep his twin for himself, is thus a rejection of the paternal law that seeks to prohibit pre-Oedipal desires and consolidate a patriarchal kinship structure. When Eça creates a space for such non-normative desire — or better still, creates a space in which to depict their lack of space in society — he also violates the principles of Naturalism and its post-Enlightenment antecedents that seek knowledge in part through the denial of that space. Indeed, if Naturalism, and in a wider sense positivism, is Eça’s inherited discourse, the model for the Geração de ’70, works such as A reliquia and “José Matias” reveal its insufficiencies, problematising the naturalised bonds of kinship to unearth a field of limitless desire constrained, like Cain himself, by the Law of the Father. Oedipus kills his father and marries his mother because he is unable to recognise them for who they really are. In a similar vein, Eça’s undoing of his inherited model, from a country drifting towards the margins of Western culture, promises to reveal the blindspots of a discourse in which, like the nameless narrator of “José Matias”, we are unable to recognise ourselves and others, let alone impart knowledge in the hope of revolutionary change.

We will never quite know, of course, why Eça de Queirós was so concerned with questions of kinship and forbidden desire. Some will point to the author’s own life and his uncle’s refusal to consent to his marrying his cousin, with whom he had amorous relations in his youth, though this explanation, of course, collapses meaning (back) into the author, that other, little god. Others will 136 For this psychoanalytic reading of the story in the Islamic tradition, see Fethi Benslama, Psychoanalysis and the Challenge of Islam, translated by Robert Bononno (Minneapolis: Minnesota UP, 2009), pp. 189-91.

---

137 See Edmundo Moniz, As mulheres proibidas: o incesto em Eça de Queirós (São Paulo: José Olympio, 1993), p. 27.
pursue more ideological explanations rooted in the author’s anarchistic political convictions. However, if, as I have argued, the problematisation of kinship in his work questions the foundations of patriarchal capitalism, it is surely apt that such a critique should emerge from a country that was declining in influence within this socio-economic system in its increasingly globalised form, made especially visible during the various crises of the nineteenth century. Eça thus works in the other direction to Botelho: whilst both authors implicate kinship in the country’s ills, for the latter, it is its normative manifestation that spells a return to prosperity, whereas for Eça, this is in fact a parentesco postiço offering only the last rose of summer, heralding the dissolution of values forever more. The physical degeneration of José Matias (and indeed of Eça’s “sociedade podre”) is therefore not, as with the Baron of Lavos, the “inevitable” culmination of decadence and pernicious heredity, but rather bound up with his adherence to an archaic model of true love with no place in a modern Portugal that cherishes exchange value whilst repressing (violently perhaps, in the case of “José Matias”) non-normative desire in pursuit of its own truth.

Eça’s novels as a whole, therefore, can be theorised as writing against the inherited discourse to reveal its assumptions and insufficiencies. Rather than attempting to reaffirm, tirelessly as in Lavos, the language of “science”, Eça dwells on its ambiguities and internal confusion, surrounding what is accepted and perceived — exchanged? — with indeterminacy and incomprehension. Harold Bloom, who describes intra-poetic relationships as “parallels of family romance”, identifies the “weak” modern poet as akin to Adam, reproducing the father’s law, and the “strong” poet as Satan, who rejects the incarnation of God’s son. To continue the analogy, Eça’s writing verges on the Satanic, rejecting Naturalist claims to truth but also, in the end, acknowledging the banishment of defeat to preserve what remains of the ideal íntimo a que se aspirava. Thus the short story “O Senhor Diabo” expresses awe and respect for the fallen angel, “a figura mais dramática da História da Alma”:

em certos momentos da história, o Diabo é o representante imenso do direito humano. Quer a liberdade, a fecundidade, a força, a lei. É então uma espécie de Pã sinistro, onde rugem as fundas rebeliões da Natureza. (Contos, p. 43).

To see the world as Satan, or indeed as Cain, is to reject the Father’s Law in search of the most ardent desires of human nature. Eça takes up Satan’s mantle to find far more dimensions to man’s desiring than the various gods throughout history have generally allowed, whether these religious, literary, monarchical or republican. In so doing, he exposes the parentesco postiço of a country whose sons and daughters, in counter-Hegelian fashion, cannot escape the problematic 138 I am drawing here on El Fahl’s concept of the amor fora do lugar.

---

139 Bloom, p. 8.

140 Ibid., p. 20.
relations of the past, awaiting the return of a king who cannot live up to his father’s muddled name, a dilemma now tragically relived in the bourgeois family home. Clearly, Eça’s socio-historical critique is many times more nuanced than that of Abel Botelho, who largely upholds the inherited discourse even if he gestures towards its own weaknesses. If Eça sees with the eyes of Satan, Botelho acts at the most as an anxious Adam, peering into the fires of Hell, perhaps, but wearing the blackened spectacles bequeathed to Teodorico. Such a characterisation is doubtless reflected in the different canonical positioning of the two authors. But they do have something striking in common: both explore their nation’s changing position within the structures of Western power by disrupting the logic of patriarchal kinship, and both concede victory to the bourgeoisie as the old order visibly disintegrates. Moreover, be it through allegory, metaphor, dreams and fantasy, or the return to Greek modes of being and desiring, both authors, at some level, pit Naturalism against itself, modifying its discourse to contemplate a country represented, in an almost “natural” fashion at the fin de siècle, as decadent and peripheral.
Chapter III: Aluísio Azevedo

Introduction: um naturalismo nos trópicos

The publication of Cruz e Sousa’s Missal (1893) offers critics one of those felicitous moments in which an apparently minor detail brilliantly captures the intellectual zeitgeist. Following this collection of poetry, written by a black poet from Florianópolis and published in Rio de Janeiro, is the subtitle “Brasil — Sul”. The geographical marker seems ingenuous enough, but when we pose the question of its purpose — as did Adolfo Caminha, with a tone of great frustration, after its publication — it is clear that the publisher was pulling a particular set of ideological strings relating to climate, environment and intellectual life. As we have seen earlier in this thesis, the supposedly pernicious effects of a hot climate were readily used, in intellectual circles, to cement the perceived cultural superiority of centres of dominance in temperate Northern Europe, contrasted against the presumed licentiousness and slovenliness of the “Sotadic Zone” beginning at the Pyrenees. Considerations of climate, meanwhile, slipped into questions of race and sexual practices. What is interesting in this case, however, is how the logic is reproduced, in near-perfect symmetry, to the south of the equator. In Brazil, of course, the most temperate regions are found in the south of the country, and the publisher of Missal once more relates a cooler climate to a more refined intellectual capacity, contrasted in this instance, presumably, with the fiercely hot Nordeste. The contrast was perceived to be all the more pronounced by the fact that the south of Brazil was also, and remains today, racially whiter and economically more advantaged than the north of the country, being specifically chosen by the government to attract European immigrants at the end of the nineteenth century. The words “Brazil — Sul” thus fracture Brazilian cultural output against criteria of climate and putative degeneracy imported from Europe. As usual, fin-de-siècle thought has a remarkable ability to proliferate analytical categories in its insatiable thirst for purity, homogeneity, clarity and binary formulations. This inconspicuous subtitle, however, exposes something of the particular trouble with such ideas in Brazil: whilst they had popular currency and could apparently mobilise the identifications of an overwhelmingly white readership culturally aligned with Europe (in this case, no doubt, luring them to the work of one of Brazil’s first black poets), they often operated in such a way that pitted the country against itself.

1 João de Cruz e Sousa, Missal (Rio de Janeiro: Magalhães & Cia Editores, 1893).

As a case in point, Caminha’s extensive criticism of the words “Brazil — Sul”, which is characteristically pointed and insistent, ties itself in the same theoretical knot. Like most of the Brazilian Naturalist writers, including Aluísio Azevedo, whose work I will be considering in this chapter, Caminha was from the “underdeveloped” Northeast and thus well positioned to critique the supposed cultural superiority of the South. He mentions at the end of the piece, for example, that a key reason for the differences in cultural output between the north and south of the country is their differing proximity to the metropolis. However, despite this gesture towards a social-constructivist argument, most of the text is in fact devoted to replacing one theory of climate with another, including drawing on Montesquieu to argue that the heat of the tropics heightens, rather than depresses, intellectual sensibilities: “[o] calor, acelerando as forças vivas da natureza humana, empresta ao homem certa energia moral… ao contrário do gelo, do frio e das brumas, que produzem uma enervação doente e grande abatimento d’alma”. The north-south logic is reversed, but the underlying discourse of pathology remains essentially unchanged. Similarly, if not without some contradiction, Caminha goes on to argue that the Northeast is in fact the most temperate region of Brazil, if “temperate” is taken to mean constancy and stability. The intellectual dilemma is clear: an essentialising “science” is deployed to convey authority, but that same science works to degrade large swathes of the country. And of course, what are flattened here as geographical regions in fact disguise different demographics, and ultimately if not exclusively, differing distributions of races within Brazil.

This intellectual dilemma is one of the most salient characteristics of Naturalist literature from Brazil: any adoption of hierarchical theories of race, heredity and climate — where authority increasingly rested — entailed an acceptance of Brazil as, at best, struggling to float above the bottom of that hierarchy. Such a stance thus might seem to differ little from the Portuguese experience, since, as we have seen, works such as O Barão de Lavos also draw on degeneration theory in ways that denigrate the nation and its past. However, whilst degeneration theory surely marginalised Portugal in relation to its northern neighbours, in Brazil, the racial makeup of the population was such that hierarchies of “degeneracy” could cast a wider net, identifying large

---

5 Caminha, p. 111.
6 Ibid., p. 11 (emphasis added).
7 Ibid., pp. 108-10.
swathes of the population that were thought to pose a problem for the nation’s future, and thus lending the theory a redoubled sense of perceived relevancy and urgency that greatly influenced national politics. Adopted and disseminated by the Escola do Recife in the 1870s and 1880s, of which many of the Naturalist writers were admirers, positivist ideas quickly brought racial theories into the mainstream and, as we have seen, Brazil pursued a policy of branqueamento in the latter part of the nineteenth century with the explicit aim of producing a whiter, “viable” future population. Meanwhile, the proponents of racial theory trod an impossibly fine line between staying faithful to the theories they admired and maintaining some hope for the nation’s future, often giving rise to contradictory formulations broadly analogous to Caminha’s critique in “Norte e Sul”. Sílvio Romero, for example, the most prominent figure of early racial theory in Brazil and member of the Escola do Recife, did so first by stressing the potential benefits of miscegenation, paving the way for the “whitening” solution, and later of educating the general populace in a more social-constructivist turn, though always with the fraught aim of overcoming the supposedly inherent inferiority of the Brazilian “stock”. I will explore some of Romero’s ideas in more detail over the course of this chapter, but suffice it here to say that the Naturalist movement in Brazil was underpinned by an energetic intellectual debate surrounding heredity and environment, and that in this debate each was put forward as a form of resistance to the marginalising implications of “scientific” thought. The importance of heredity was underlined in Darwinian theories of evolution, which explained evolution by the survival and reproduction of those best adapted to the environment, whilst in theories based on those of Jean-Baptiste Lamarck, which remained popular in late-nineteenth-century Brazil, the supposedly altering effects of the environment were taken to be the chief drivers of evolutionary change. In the Brazilian texts especially, heredity and environment are important, if problematic, concepts for analysis, explored systematically in the works of Azevedo and Caminha, and with the emphasis often shifting from one to the other in tentative moves of resistance against the conclusions of European theorists.

Drawing as it does on this precarious theoretical framework, Naturalist literature in Brazil has not, generally speaking, attracted broad critical acclaim. Whilst Eça de Queirós probably rescued the movement from near oblivion in Portugal, the reception of Naturalist literature in Brazil varies between cautious praise, scandal and ridicule. Earlier criticism tends to focus on a perceived weakness of style and crude preoccupation with sex, typically compared against Zola’s

---

10 Ibid., p. 167.
12 Ibid., p. 153.
model. As Josué Montello writes, “as quatro figuras representativas do Naturalismo brasileiro, inclinaram-se pela cópia da realidade, com um ou outro traço de tinta violenta e crua”. Dorothy Loos writes that style, for the Brazilian Naturalists and in contrast to Zola, was “unimportant”, and that they “came to concentrate more and more upon what was evil, to stress the sensational, the crude and the lascivious”. Indeed, some critics suggest that lascivious bedroom scenes work as a convenient excuse to avoid contemplation of pressing social issues, most obviously the continuation of slavery. More recent criticism has focused on the role of racial prejudice in the Brazilian Naturalist novel. David Brookshaw identifies Naturalism as notably “responsible” for the continuing animalisation of black people and circulation of racial stereotypes, and asserts that writers such as Caminha and Azevedo, even if pro-Abolition, were not so “for any love of the negro”, being instead “products of an expanding urban bourgeoisie, who were committed to the ideals of technology and free skilled labour as instruments of economic development”, sentiments that were enshrined in the Brazilian flag as Ordem e Progresso. For Murray MacNicoll, meanwhile, Azevedo’s O Mulato is too reliant on racial prejudice to work as anything other than “an exposé of provincial pettiness”, as he criticises the author for “finding it difficult to attain an atmosphere of scientific objectivity in dealing with his native province”, again suggesting that departure from Zola’s model constitutes a literary weakness. Of all Brazilian Naturalist works, only Azevedo’s O Mulato and O Cortiço, Caminha’s Bom Crioulo, and perhaps Inglês de Souza’s O Missionário have reached anything close to canonical status. Even then, it is rather symbolic of the lacklustre appreciation of Brazilian Naturalism that the handsome azulejo-tiled house of Azevedo, the star of the movement in Brazil, stands in ruins on the Rua do Sol in São Luís do

---

18 Ibid., p. 238.

19 Published in 1891, this tale of a missionary’s struggle against the unforgiving Amazon landscape, often cited as one of the first Brazilian Naturalist novels, is perhaps the most obvious candidate for further study in my line of enquiry, though space constraints mean that such an analysis will have to wait for a later date. See Inglês de Souza, O Missionário (Charleston, SC: Nabu Press, 2012). See also Sodré, p. 173.
Maranhão, now earmarked for redevelopment into a car park.\textsuperscript{20} There is perhaps a certain irony in this instance of disregard for the cultural heritage of a movement that took heritage itself as one of its central concerns. After Caminha and Azevedo, the names become increasingly obscure, with Júlio Ribeiro’s \textit{A Carne}, as I mentioned elsewhere, repeatedly described as the worst book in the history of Brazilian literature.\textsuperscript{21}

There have, nonetheless, been attempts by critics to rescue Caminha and Azevedo from scholarly disregard, and I will consider these in this chapter as I turn, once more, to the representation of kinship to arrive at a different, less straight(forward) understanding of these texts. Most notably, Antônio Cândido’s now classic essay, “De Cortiço a Cortiço”, praises Azevedo’s adaptation of Zola’s model to represent Brazilian social realities, which, he argues, results in a greater reliance on allegory to reflect a society in which social classes were still in the process of being spatially segregated.\textsuperscript{22} As with the Portuguese authors, I will be paying close attention to the Brazilian Naturalists’ use of allegory, by no means limited to \textit{O Cortiço}, as well as to the process of adaptation and “copying” of an imported model, looking not at how “successfully” these authors follow Zola’s model, but at how they deal with the problems of its inadequacy in Brazil. This inadequacy was, after all, widely discussed at the time: Araripe Júnior went as far as to assert that Naturalism could not succeed in Brazil because of the country’s detrimental (“entorpecente”) climate that supposedly impeded careful study.\textsuperscript{23}

For those familiar with conceptual problems in Brazilian culture, the anecdote of “Brazil — Sul”, and indeed the paradoxical adoption of degeneration theory in a supposedly “degenerate” Brazil, will appear as symptomatic of a wider phenomenon in which European ideas of questionable relevancy are copied and imported, a process that Roberto Schwarz identifies compellingly as “misplaced ideas”, or \textit{ideias fora de lugar}.\textsuperscript{24} For Schwarz, there is an inescapable “caráter imitativo” to Brazilian cultural life, a “contradição entre a realidade nacional e o prestígio ideológico dos países que nos servem de modelo”.\textsuperscript{25} Thus in the nineteenth century, liberalism circulated amongst an elite whose wealth, literacy and social position nevertheless derived primarily from slavery and, after its abolition in 1888, a continuing culture of “favour” and

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{21} Loos, p. 54.
\item \textsuperscript{22} See Antônio Cândido, “De Cortiço a Cortiço”, \textit{Novos Estudos}, CEBRAP, No. 30, July 1991, pp. 111-129.
\item \textsuperscript{23} Cited by Sodré, p. 172.
\item \textsuperscript{24} Roberto Schwarz, “As ideias fora do lugar”, in \textit{Ao vencedor as batatas} (São Paulo: Editora 34, 2000), pp. 11-31.
\item \textsuperscript{25} Roberto Schwarz, “Nacional por subtração”, in \textit{Que horas são? Ensaíos} (São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1987), pp. 29-48 (pp. 29-30).
\end{itemize}
dependency, leading to an inescapable “antagonism” at the level of ideas. In this sense, Brazilian Naturalism, drawing as it does heavily on theories of degeneracy that marginalised Brazil itself, rehearses the dilemma of misplaced ideas particularly keenly.

However, arguably the most surprising aspects of these texts, as Cândido’s article demonstrates, come into view when focussing precisely on the problematic process of cultural “importation”. As Schwarz, Cândido’s pupil, goes on to argue, if cultural “borrowing” in Brazil is taken to be antithetical to “authentic” national cultural production, it can be overcome neither by “subtracting” the imported element from the whole nor by conducting a facile philosophical deconstruction of the concept of copy. Instead, any “originality” in Brazilian cultural production is to be found in the potentially transgressive, supplementary space that opens up in the process of reiteration. This idea is also developed by Silviano Santiago, who reads Eça’s O Primo Basílio not just as a “copy” of Madame Bovary, of which it was accused at the time, but as a reflection on the prior work and transgression of the model, working to complement Flaubert’s novel. For Santiago, this corruption of the model is no less than the organising principle of Lusophone literatures of the time:

In this view, reading Brazilian texts vis-à-vis their European models is necessary to their understanding, for this is where the writer’s meditation is compelled to reside. If, in other words, ideas are generally misplaced in Brazil, there is yet scope for these ideas to be altered and made one’s own, consciously or otherwise.

Naturalism, therefore, which presents the Brazilian writer with a particularly unpalatable set of misplaced ideas, emerges as a conspicuous candidate for a reading of what Santiago terms the “entre-lugar” of Latin American discourse. Indeed, its cultural loans were by no means restricted

---

26 Schwarz, “As ideias…”, p. 17.
29 Ibid., p. 53.
30 See Santiago, “O entre-lugar do discurso americano”, in Uma literatura…, pp. 9-26 to European theories of race, sex and criminality: the Brazilian Naturalists drew extensively on fictional texts by their most admired writers, in particular Zola, Flaubert and Eça de Queirós. The latter especially was vexed that his works were adapted to stage without his permission in Brazil, and many of his novels were plagiarised, retold and adapted. As Vieira asserts, “[o]s brasileiros achavam que tudo o que fosse escrito em português podia ser reproduzido por eles”; the problem of plagiarism was deemed so grave that a legal agreement was eventually signed between Portugal and Brazil, protecting literary and artistic production from each country, in September 1889. Its impact is debatable: both O Mulato (1881) and Caminha’s A normalista (1893) are, to a similar extent, “copies” of O Crime do Padre Amaro, suggesting a continuum here between appropriation and plagiarism, a process acquiring legal and financial implications, and reflecting the lucrative state of the Lusophone Naturalist literary market. A normalista in particular warrants further discussion here, as it neatly exemplifies the Naturalists’ productive engagement with a presumed cultural obligation to copy, which often surprises the reader with what might be termed, to misquote Silviano Santiago, um naturalismo nos trópicos.

A normalista, Caminha’s first novel, broadly follows the plot structure of O Crime. Maria do Carmo is a vulnerable, orphaned schoolgirl brought up in the care of her godfather, João da Mata, in Fortaleza, Ceará. Abusing his patriarchal position in a manner similar to Amaro, he seduces his goddaughter, who becomes pregnant and is sent into hiding in the house of an old cashew fruit seller known as the “velha dos cajus”. Despite her reputation for growing sweet, ripe fruit, she is a careless midwife and allows the baby to fall to the floor at birth. The heartless João da Mata is relieved at the baby’s death, while Maria do Carmo’s initial distress appears to give way to indifference as she is found, years later, happily married to a police sergeant, imagining “diante de si um futuro largo, imensamente luminoso, como um grande mar tranquilo e dormente”. As we shall see, this final plot development is significant insofar as it constitutes a departure from O Crime. The influence of Eça, indeed, readily becomes a dialogue analogous to that which Eça himself performs with Madame Bovary in O Primo Basílio. Thus one remarkable passage has Maria do Carmo read a copy of Basílio that she borrows from her friend Lídia Campelo:

— Acabei O Primo Basílio!
— Que tal?
— Magnífico, sublime! Olha, vem cá… E dando o braço à outra dirigiu-se para o banheiro

[...].

32 Ibid., p. 96.

Uma vez ali, sentadas ambas num caixote que fora de sabão, única mobília do banheiro, Maria sacou fora o Primo Basílio, cuidadosamente embrulhado numa folha da Província. Queria que a Lídia explicasse uma passagem muito difusa, quase impenetrável à sua inteligência.

— É isto, menina, que eu não pude compreender bem. E, abrindo o livro, leu: ...e ele (Basílio) quis-lhe ensinar então a verdadeira maneira de beber champanha. Talvez ela não soubesse! — Como é? perguntou Luísa tomando o copo. — Não é com o copo! Horror! Ninguém que se preza bebe champanha por um copo. O copo é bom para o Colares... Tomou um gole de champanha e num beijo passou-o para a boca dela, Luísa riu..., etc., etc...

— Como explicas tu isso?

— Tola! fez a Campelinho. Uma coisa tão simples... Toma-se um gole de champanha ou de outro qualquer líquido, junta-se boca a boca assim... E juntou a ação às palavras.

— ...e pronto! bebe-se pela boca um do outro. Tão simples...

— E que prazer há nisso?

— Sei lá, menina! tornou a outra com um gesto de nojo, cuspindo. Pode lá haver gosto...

Depois, as duas curvadas sobre o livro, unidas, coxa a coxa, braço a braço, passaram à sensação nova. Lídia apressou-se em dizer que as mulheres do mundo é que sabem essas coisas... Quanto a ela não conhecia outras sensações além dos beijos na boca, às escondidas, fora os abracinhos fortes e demorados, peito a peito, isto mesmo com pessoa do coração... Contou então que o seu primeiro namorado, um estudante do Liceu, um fedelho, tentara certa vez... Concluiu baixinho ao ouvido de Maria, com receio de que alguém as estivesse observando.

— E consentiste?

— Qual! Dei-lhe com um não na cara, e o tolo nunca mais me fez festa.34

Caminha recreates, in this passage, the titillating relationship between Luísa and Leopoldina in Basílio that we saw in the previous chapter. The language describing their interaction is familiarly Queirosonian in its flirtatious use of repetition, leading to suggestive phrases such as “coxa a coxa, braço a braço”. Their acting-out of the champagne kiss, taught to Luísa by her cousin during an amorous afternoon at their love nest, and here abandoned by the narrator in ellipses and etceteras, underscores the didactic and mimetic potential of Basílio and suggests that the much-commented “sensação nova” will soon follow in the girls' education.35 The atmosphere is made to appear correspondingly clandestine; the two friends sit hunched in a cramped bathroom and confidences are uttered discreetly.

Regina Zilberman, having identified this passage as a moment of dialogue with Eça, finds in it little significance other than its prominence as “o depoimento mais sincero da rendição dos 34 Caminha, A normalista, pp. 32-3.

35 This is a reference to the passage in which Basílio sinks between Luísa’s knees to teach her a “sensação nova”. See Eça de Queirós, O primo Basílio (Lisboa: Editora Ulisseia, 2002), p. 219.
intelectuais brasileiros ao charme do ficcionista nascido em Portugal”.\textsuperscript{36} For Carlos Bezerra, meanwhile, the passage exposes an ambivalence, on the part of the author, towards Eça’s novels, “entre censura e admiração”.\textsuperscript{37} However, if we observe the textual interaction with Eça’s work closely, \textit{A normalista} emerges as a commentary upon Naturalism and its reception in Brazil. Whilst Luísa, in \textit{Basílio}, acts out the Romantic novels she reads, most notably those of Walter Scott in a thinly veiled criticism of the vacuous ideals of Romanticism, Maria do Carmo takes precisely \textit{O Primo Basílio} as her formative model, the very work that presents itself as an antidote to “delusional” Romantic thought.\textsuperscript{38} We might interpret this not as an attack on \textit{Basílio} per se, or indeed as praise, but as an illustration of the way in which, in Brazil at least and perhaps in Portugal, the transformative potential of Naturalism misfires, doing no more than Romanticism, in the end, to effect social change. Hence, in \textit{A normalista}, the alteration of the tragic ending of \textit{O Crime}, such that Maria do Carmo is married apparently happily, but evidently for convenience and with the chilling metaphor of the future as a stupefying “mar dormente” — an ending more easily aligned with the final moonrise and \textit{vencidismo} of \textit{Os Maias} than with the more dramatic, revolutionary spirit of Eça’s early novels. Whilst Amélia in \textit{O Crime} dies after forced separation from her baby, and Luísa in \textit{Basílio} dies a gruesome death, Maria do Carmo recovers and ultimately forgets the abuse she suffers throughout the novel, just as Ceará forgets her supposedly scandalous pregnancy, much-publicised in the local press. Caminha transposes the intransigence of the Catholic Church in \textit{O Crime} to that of bourgeois cearense society. At the same time, he carefully exposes the paradox of misplaced ideas with his apparent mistrust of the cultural relevance of the movement within which he himself writes. Thus one of the novel’s most comic lines is uttered in earnest by the municipal judge who, hoping that the president of Ceará will recover from a bout of yellow fever, asserts, “[a] ciência faz milagres.” The “scientific” method that Eça uses to attack the Church in \textit{O Crime} becomes, in Caminha’s novel, oxymoronically miraculous, assimilated into the same provincial religiosity that it was designed to counteract. By reading \textit{A normalista} in light of its dialogue with cultural loans, then, rather than merely its dependency on them, we can perceive how its author was highly creative in his “copy” of \textit{O Crime do Padre Amaro}, addressing cultural problems relevant, if not necessarily unique to Brazil, and complementing the “original” work — itself widely accused of being a “copy”\textsuperscript{39} — from the margins.

\textsuperscript{36} Regina Zilberman, “Eça entre os brasileiros de ontem e hoje”, in \textit{Eças e outros: diálogos com a ficção de Eça de Queirós} (Porto Alegre: EDIPUCRS, 2002), pp. 7-21 (p. 19).

\textsuperscript{38} As Eça writes in a letter to Teófilo Braga, the novel was designed to “destruir as falsas interpretações e falsas realizações” that supposedly rotted Portuguese society. See Eça de Queirós, \textit{Correspondência} (Lisboa: Caminho, 2008), p. 135.

\textsuperscript{39} Eça himself addresses the criticism that \textit{O Crime} was a copy of Zola’s \textit{La Faute de L’Abbé Mouret} in the preface to the second edition.
of Western culture. In the readings that follow, I will be paying close attention to intertextuality and the often “corrupting”, transgressive potential of cultural dependency as the authors write “against nature” to rework ideas of kinship in Brazil.

The discussion of O Primo Basílio in Caminha’s A normalista also goes some way towards illustrating the immense popularity of Naturalist literature in Brazil at the time, despite its relative obscurity today. Aderbal de Carvalho wrote in 1894 that Basílio arrived in Brazil “como uma verdadeira bomba de dinamite”. Meanwhile, O Mulato, often regarded as the first Brazilian Naturalist novel, was an unprecedented success, selling two thousand copies in São Luís alone within a few days of its publication, an exceptional number for a relatively small city with a low literacy rate. In 1919, Domingos Barbosa wrote that no other book had been so successful in Brazil, and still in 1941, Álvaro Lins wrote that the success of O Mulato had “rarely been repeated in Brazilian letters”. As usual, the relationship between popularity and canonicity is a complex one, and the financial success of many Brazilian Naturalist novels did little to assure their immortality; indeed, often the opposite was true, and critical work consistently reproduces a characterisation of Azevedo’s work into two strands, his “serious” novels, including O Cortiço, Casa de Pensão, O Coruja and O Mulato, and what Loos describes as his “pulp productions”, which he allegedly wrote hurriedly for money, including Filomena Borges and O Homem (both of which I will nevertheless be referring to in this chapter). Lúcia Miguel Pereira went as far to describe these “lesser” novels by Azevedo as “illegible”. Meanwhile, strong book sales did not necessarily indicate straightforward popular approval. When Maria do Carmo reads Basílio in A normalista, despite being fixated by it, she criticises it for being “escabroso demais”. Contemporaneous critics widely condemned Naturalism for its supposed “immorality” and readiness to depict sex scenes. As Loos puts it, “the purported obscenity of a work was an assurance of its success with the public”. Thus the frenzied reception of Naturalism in Brazil, encompassing wonderment, excitement, scandal and offence, reflects a movement that fulfilled the desires of readers as much as it did shock them, that attracted and repelled them with the characteristic contradictions of fin-de-siècle thought. As we negotiate questions of popularity and canonicity, then, Naturalism in 42 Loos, p. 42.

---

43 Cited by Loos, p. 43.
44 Loos, pp. 40-41. See also Coutinho, p. 76.
46 Loos, p. 36.
47 Ibid., p. 31.
Brazil emerges as a movement that at once captured, reproduced and challenged the status quo, in line with Marx and Engels’ formulation of the principle of contradiction that I referred to in the introduction. These contradictory but inseparable forces will inform my analysis in these two chapters.

The theme of kinship has not, to my knowledge, been explored in any depth in the work of Aluisio Azevedo, to which I now turn in this chapter. However, I believe it is a particularly productive one, not least since his novels often revolve around questions of incest and, to a lesser extent, “queer” desire. Whilst the latter, if not the former, has attracted attention from critics, particularly surrounding the exoticised lesbian sex scene in O Cortiço, it has not been brought far beyond the bounds of degeneration theory: as we saw in the introduction, Cândido describes this and other such episodes across Lusophone literature as an “ato desnatural” and thus a “degradação do enfoque “natural” de Zola”. Building on my previous readings, I would like to problematise the notion of the “natural” in these works, relating what might better be termed “queer” relations to the author’s distortion of Naturalism through allegory, tragedy and myth. In so doing, I aim to show how Azevedo’s naturalismo nos trópicos engages closely with the analytical categories that buttressed the bourgeois identity of the fin de siècle, adapting the Naturalist discourse to reimagine notions of race, degeneracy, kinship and relationality in Brazil.

I will begin with O Mulato, a novel that has received little critical attention in recent decades, perhaps best known as a literary endorsement of abolition, mestiçagem and branqueamento. A remarkable aspect of this novel has not been adequately explored: the incestuous nature of the central, interracial relationship and its function within an Oedipal story strikingly similar to that of Os Maias, published some eight years later. Indeed, although I have so far been suggesting that the process of cultural appropriation is unidirectional, from Europe to Brazil, I argue that this might be an instance in which the reverse is true. In any case, a comparison of the two novels will prove productive, I hope, in eliciting their cultural specificities. Both O Mulato and Os Maias deploy the story of Oedipus to rethink the foundations of society, but in remarkably different ways. I then move through Azevedo’s work chronologically to Casa de Pensão, arguing that Azevedo becomes increasingly interested in the transformative power of the environment over heritage, which 49 Berta Waldman identifies kinship as a central theme in Casa de Pensão, relating it to the epistemological tensions in the narration. See introduction to Casa de Pensão, 5th edition (São Paulo: Editora Atlética, 1989), pp. 5-9 (p. 6). I will return to this insight in my subsequent analysis of the novel.

50 Cândido, p. 127.
51 For this argument, see, for example, Elizabeth A. Marchant, “Naturalism Race, and Nationalism in Aluisio Azevedo’s O Mulato”, Hispania, Vol. 83, No. 2 (September 2000), pp. 445-453.
corresponds, on the plane of kinship, to a replacement of blood ties with bonds of economic convenience, allegorising notions of family. If, as Cândido argues, O Cortiço functions as an allegory of a diverse but divided Brazil, kinship will be seen to dissolve into the picture, with the terminology of relationality assimilated into a fast-changing social order, characterised by free-market capitalism and the patriarchal hangover of slavery and colonialism.

Oedipus in Brazil: Aluísio Azevedo’s *O Mulato

Azevedo’s second novel was published in 1881 when the author had yet to turn twenty five, and was soon recognised as marking the beginning of the Naturalist movement in Brazil.53 O Mulato resonates clearly with the dilemma presented by the words “Brazil—Sul”, taking as its focus the steamy northern province of Maranhão, Azevedo’s birthplace, and portraying it in a characteristically unflattering, at times disdainful Naturalist light. Several critics suggest the novel’s "extremely combative spirit"54 in part reflects the author’s personal grudge against his native province, evidenced by characters modelled “with little doubt” on contemporary figures of Maranhense high society.55 As a “copy” of O Crime do Padre Amaro, O Mulato transports the pettiness of Leiria to the streets of São Luís do Maranhão. The similarities in plot to O Crime are significant, seen primarily in the pivotal role played by a corrupt Catholic Church, but they are insufficient in themselves as an explanation for the novel’s structure.56 Ana Rosa, daughter of the businessman Manuel Pescada, is an innocent local beauty who falls in love with her long-lost cousin, the highly educated mulatto, Raimundo. Disapproving of miscegenation and hoping to secure and expand his business interests, Manuel wishes for his daughter to marry his sly Portuguese employee, Dias, and refuses Raimundo’s request for his cousin’s hand in marriage. The two plan to elope, but manipulated by the villainous Cônego Diogo, Ana Rosa confesses that she is carrying Raimundo’s child, whilst Dias and the priest, calculating the strength of their relationship, conspire to foil their plot to escape. Raimundo is shot in the street by Dias, and Ana Rosa miscarries upon seeing his dead body paraded through the city. Years later, however, she is found apparently happily married to Dias in a clear victory for the old, racist institutions represented

54 MacNicoll, p. 239.

55 Loos, p. 44.

56 I thus disagree here with Josué Montello’s book-length study of O Mulato, which reads the novel almost exclusively through the lens of anti-clericalism and what he claims is its “concordância… perfeita” with O Crime do Padre Amaro. See Montello, Aluísio Azevedo…, p. 3. As we shall see, Azevedo draws on a much wider range of influences in his structuring of O Mulato, including local maranhense myths.
by Manuel and Cônego Diogo. Maranhão, “[g]eographically isolated” and historically “the periphery of colonial Brazil”, remains, at the end of the novel, and like Leiria in O Crime, stubbornly immune to the social changes embodied in the voice of the Naturalist narrator.

However, as I have already indicated, O Mulato bears as many similarities to Eça’s Os Maias (1888) as it does to O Crime, although this comparison has not, to my knowledge, been explored by critics. It is of course impossible that Azevedo drew on Os Maias, written and published several years later, although it is quite possible, if perhaps less orthodox, to suggest that Eça drew on O Mulato, given, as we have seen, that he followed Brazilian literary production closely, including where writers “plagiarised” his work. Allow me, therefore, to rehearse the plot of O Mulato in a way that elicits these similarities. The novel begins with Raimundo’s arrival in São Luís, just as Os Maias commences with the arrival of Carlos da Maia in Lisbon. Raimundo is similarly educated with the most modern of ideas, schooled in medicine and law, and is well-travelled and cosmopolitan. This contrasts with his religious and often superstitious compatriots.

Azevedo archetypes the figures of Raimundo, Manuel and Cônego Diogo to bring their ideological differences into sharp contrast:

Por esse tempo aqueles três surgiam na rua, formando cada qual mais vivo contraste com os outros: Manuel no seu tipo pesado e chato de negociante, calças de brim e paletó de alpaca; o cônego imponente na sua batina lustrosa, aristocrata, mostrando as meias de seda escarlate e o pé mimoso, apertadinho no sapato de polimento; Raimundo, todo europeu, elegante, com uma roupa de casimira leve, adequada ao clima do Maranhão, escandalizando o bairro comercial com o seu chapéu-de-sol coberto de linho claro e forrado de verde pela parte de dentro. Formavam, dizia este último, chasqueando, sem tirar o charuto da boca, uma respeitável trindade filosófica, na qual, ali, o Sr. Cônego representava a teologia, o Sr. Manuel a metafísica, e ele, Raimundo, a filosofia positiva, o que, aplicado à política, traduzia-se na prodigiosa aliança dos três governos o do papado, o monárquico e o republicano! (p. 109, emphasis added)

Raimundo, then, like Carlos, is educated with ideas greatly at odds with his new environment — fora do lugar, perhaps? — and the stage is set for a clash of ideologies as well as personalities. There is already a hint of mockery in the narrator’s description of Raimundo as “todo europeu”, and the position of the narrator will prove critical as Raimundo attempts to reconcile his European ideas with his family history in Maranhão. Raimundo, consciously at least, comes to the province to sell his ancestral properties with hopes of establishing himself later in Rio de Janeiro. In an extended “flashback” chapter detailing his family history, however, again similar to the second

57 Aluísio Azevedo, O Mulato (São Paulo: Klick Editora, 1999). All page references are to this edition.

58 MacNicoll, p. 234.
chapter of Os Maias, we then learn that he is the son of José da Silva — Manuel Pescada’s brother — and, unbeknown to him and Ana Rosa, his slave and “amante”, Domingas. José da Silva, whose wealth derives from the illegal slave trade, is married to the cruel Dona Quitéria, who achieves infamy for brutally lashing her slaves in attacks of sadism. She despises her husband’s affection for Raimundo, conceived before their marriage, leading her to burn Domingas in an act of genital mutilation. The young Raimundo assists in horror as his mother descends into madness, and is compelled to leave the family quinta of São Brás to live with Manuel Pescada in São Luís. Ana Rosa is born, and the two are briefly brought up as siblings, Raimundo being treated as a son by Manuel’s wife Mariana, who deeply regrets not marrying for love. Meanwhile, José da Silva discovers that the young Cônego Diogo is having an affair with his wife, Dona Quitéria, whom he strangles to death. Diogo then fatally shoots José in an act of vengeance, using his influential position to orchestrate a coverup. Raimundo is sent to be educated in Lisbon and Coimbra, unaware of his origins and, like Carlos da Maia, travels Europe saturated with positivist ideas. When he returns to his ancestral home in São Luís, past turmoils apparently forgotten, he and his cousin who, like Carlos and Maria Eduarda, once shared a cradle in infancy, fall passionately in love with each other as Raimundo fatefully tries to discover his heritage. Finally learning of his maternal ancestry through Manuel Pescada after he is refused Ana Rosa’s hand in marriage, Raimundo comes close to fathoming Cônego Diogo’s dark secrets, offering the reader a fleeting promise of a just resolution to events. However, the canon skilfully dispels Raimundo’s doubts about his father’s death and history is set to repeat itself: Diogo has Raimundo murdered like his father before him, securing the public interpretation of the death as a suicide, and the social order, briefly perturbed by Raimundo’s reappearance in São Luís, returns to its former state.

The similarities with Os Maias are compelling, seen principally in the authors’ deployment of an Oedipal framework disrupted in the youngest generation such that the identity of the mother is repressed, her name erased from the family past. The repressed mother then returns problematically in the form of a long-lost sister — biologically so in Os Maias, and functionally so in O Mulato. Thus Ana Rosa and Raimundo are described as “companheiros de berço, criados juntos, que nem irmãos” (p. 101) and soon after meeting each other as adults, Ana Rosa comments to Raimundo that she laments not having a brother. To Raimundo, meanwhile, Ana Rosa figures as “uma irmã, de quem ele estivera ausente desde a infância” (p. 105). Both sets of “siblings” in O Mulato and Os Maias share a cradle in infancy and begin sexual relations in 59 As regards the novel’s similarities with Os Maias, it is interesting to note that O Mulato was published after Eça wrote A tragédia da Rua das Flores (1877-8) and before the publication of Os Maias chronologically, both novels that take incest as a central theme. In the lesser-known A tragédia, however, which was not published in Eça’s lifetime, the incest occurs between mother and son, and in many ways Os Maias, with its banished mother and long-forgotten siblings, bears many more similarities to O Mulato. Thus even if Eça did not take his cues from Azevedo in his concern with incest itself, the differences between Os Maias and A tragédia raise the possibility that Eça revised his approach after reading Azevedo’s supposed “copy” of O Crime. See Eça de Queirós, A tragédia da Rua das Flores (Lisboa: Fernando Pereira, 1980).

---

adulthood, anticipating the Freudian schema in which sexual desires in adulthood are modelled on experiences of intimacy as a child, the mother’s image typically becoming the unconscious object of desire for a grown boy. It is in this sense that Ana Rosa’s passive temperament can be read in a more productive light than one which reduces it to evidence of misogyny on the part of the author. This is the conclusion of Elizabeth Marchant, who argues that whilst Azevedo seeks to represent race as a social construction in O Mulato, he naturalises gender such that Ana Rosa’s character is “more in keeping with nineteenth-century scientific ideas about femaleness” than Raimundo’s is with contemporary ideas about race.60 Whilst I do not mean to dispute such accusations of misogyny, I do propose that Ana Rosa’s passivity has broader structural repercussions within the novel, endowing her with a servile attitude that aligns her closely with Raimundo’s slave-mother Domingas, and thus approximating her to Raimundo’s unconscious image of the mother. The alignment is hardly subtle: when Ana Rosa realises she is in love with Raimundo, she wishes to “tornar-se passiva, servi-lo como uma escrava amorosa, dôcil, fraca” (p. 124). Even before meeting him, she imagines herself marrying a man “a quem ela pudesse amar abertamente como amante e obedecer em segredo como escrava” (p. 26). In a crisis of passion, she exclaims to her cousin, “É uma escrava que chora a teus pés!” (p. 265). Losing her mother at a young age, “justamente quando mais precisava do amparo maternal” (p. 21), Ana Rosa is greatly influenced by her wet nurse and mãe-pretinha, Mônica, such that she herself has a slave as a model for identification — a slave who, having bought her own freedom, continues to serve the family regardless. Raimundo, meanwhile, is clearly titillated by his cousin’s servile tendencies. Imagining their happy marriage together, he concludes a lengthy interior monologue with the words, “[a]lém de que, com um filho nas entranhas, ela lhe obedeceria como escrava!…” (p. 312). Therefore, whilst Azevedo makes use of misogynistic tropes, these are used productively to rework the (European) Oedipal matrix for the Brazilian context, where Raimundo is fatefully attracted to his banished slave-mother, functionally reincarnated in the figure of his cousin-sister. In Os Maias, Carlos seeks to return to the repressed mother who is rejected for her ancestral links to the slave trade; in O Mulato, the slave herself is banished from the family home (principally by Quitéria), and it is the image of slavery that is then unwittingly sought by her son. This compulsive return to the relations and economics of the past, by a self-described “positivist” mulatto who is both victim of racism and beneficiary of the spoils of the illegal slave trade, will be of central importance in my subsequent understanding of the text.

Azevedo develops the Oedipal framework in O Mulato particularly clearly, including, like the Portuguese Naturalists before him, references to classical texts. Cônego Diogo, who regularly utters obscure Latin phrases as a means to convey authority, is the figure who consistently works to bury kinship trouble in the past, offering Ana Rosa a “remédio” for the abortion of her mulatto baby, advising Manuel against recognising Raimundo as his nephew, suppressing knowledge of 60 Marchant, p. 450.

José da Silva’s murder of his adulterous wife, and plotting the assassination of Raimundo to avoid any probing into that of his father. He succeeds in all these attempts whilst maintaining the image of a saintly and humble servant, terms in which his fellow maranhenses often describe him. “É um santo homem!”; “Um santo! Um verdadeiro santo!” (p. 60). On two occasions, to dodge a response when asked a difficult question, Diogo remarks, “Davus sum non Aedipus!” (pp. 182, 292). This line is taken from Terence’s Andria, uttered by Davus in an attempt to dodge an uncomfortable question. In the classical play, Davus is the slave trickster whose private schemes, like those of Diogo, are blissfully overlooked. He references Oedipus’ encounter with the Sphinx to define his opposite rhetorical role: if Oedipus is the solver of riddles and, ultimately if tragically, unearths kinship trouble from the past, Davus works in the other direction, obscuring this past from view. These words, in O Mulato, become Diogo’s mantra, raison d’être and structural function within the novel as he strives to prevent the social order from confronting the contradictions that Oedipus, or Raimundo, both contain and threaten to reveal.

Raimundo, indeed, is drawn inexorably towards the void in his knowledge of the past that Cônego Diogo artfully constructs over the decades. First and foremost, it is of great structural importance in O Mulato that Raimundo is not consistently recognised as mixed race, meaning he can remain unaware of his ancestral past. Marchant argues that “[h]is relative whiteness may be read as a means to garner the sympathy of a white reading audience” and as an affirmation of the supposed virtues of branqueamento. Again, whilst I do not mean to dispute this, it is surely equally significant for its role in sustaining a missing page in Raimundo’s memory of the past, a page he seeks to recover over the course of the novel. Raimundo therefore asks himself who his mother is at five different points, and uncertainties surrounding his heritage haunt him from the moment in the narration that he develops free indirect discourse; namely when, as a child in Lisbon, he receives a letter from Mariana, Manuel’s wife:

as suas reminiscências não iam além da casa do tio; no entanto, queria parecer-lhe que a sua verdadeira mãe não era aquela senhora, aquela vinha a ser sua tia, porque era a mulher de seu tio Manuel; e até, se lhe não falhava a memória, por mais de uma vez ouvira dela própria falar na outra, na sua verdadeira mãe... Mas quem seria a outra? Como se chamava?... Nunca lho disseram!... (p. 69)

The lengthy sentence, with its incomplete clauses suggesting erratic thought, followed by repeated ellipses and questions, gestures towards the lacuna in Raimundo’s self-knowledge that propels, on some level, his future journey of discovery in Maranhão. Thus although he repeatedly affirms that his sole desire there is to “liquidar os meus negócios e pôr-me ao fresco!” (p. 52), his travels are marked from the beginning by a desire to (re)discover his heritage. His “maior empenho” on travelling to inspect his properties with Manuel is to visit the most worthless financially, his ruined birthplace of São Brás, in the hope of learning something of his ancestry; when Manuel refuses to go there first, he agrees, but “praguejando entre dentes contrariado e cheio de tédio: Que grandíssima estopada! O diabo da tal fazenda do inferno parecia fugir diante deles!...” (p. 193). This mirage-like figuration of São Brás metaphorises that same void in Raimundo’s consciousness that spurs his voyage through his ancestral past, a journey that he refuses to acknowledge as important with corresponding insistency. Travelling to Maranhão, in another passage of free indirect discourse, he will only admit to economic concerns as the motive for his travels:

---

62 Marchant, p. 448.

Raimundo perdia-se em conjeturas e, malgrado o seu desprendimento pelo passado, sentia alguma coisa atraí-lo irresistivelmente para a pátria. Quem sabia se aí não descobriria a ponta do enigma?... Ele, que sempre vivera órfão de afeições legítimas e duradouras, como então seria feliz!... Ah, se chegasse a saber quem era sua mãe, perdoar-lhe-ia tudo, tudo!

O quinhão de ternura, que a ela pertencia, estava intacto no coração do filho. Era preciso entregá-lo a alguém! Era preciso desvendar as circunstâncias que determinaram o seu nascimento!

Mas, no fim de contas, refletia Raimundo, em um retrocesso natural de impressões, que diabo tinha ele com tudo isso, se até aí, na ignorância desses fatos, vivera estimado e feliz!... Não foi decerto para semelhante coisa que viera à província! Por conseguinte, era liquidar os seus negócios, vender os seus bens e por aqui é o caminho! O Rio de Janeiro lá estava a sua espera!

Abriria, ao chegar lá, o seu escritório, trabalharia, e, ao lado da mulher com quem casasse e dos filhos que viesse a ter, nem sequer havia de lembrar-se do passado!

Sim, que mais poderia desejar melhor?... Concluía os estudos, viajara muito, tinha saúde, possuia alguns bens de fortuna. Era caminhar pra frente e deixar em paz o tal passado! O passado, passado! Ora adeus! (pp. 51-2)

The promising future that Raimundo sees for himself is similar to that envisaged for Carlos da Maia by his friends and family. However, as with Carlos, there are already ominous signs for what lies ahead. The past is a continuing source of fascination and mystery, shrouded in vagueness: “sentia alguma coisa atraí-lo irresistivelmente para a pátria” is a conspicuously superstitious sentiment for a man who laughs derisively at the concept of superstition just weeks later, when Maria Bárbara, Ana Rosa’s uncompromisingly racist grandmother, claims her granddaughter is victim of a curse (p. 104). (I will return to the significance of superstition and myth in O Mulato later, as a it works as a disruptive counterpoint to Raimundo’s positivist thought.) Mystery and conjecture then produce excitement and resolve; “[e]ra preciso entregá-lo a alguém! Era preciso desvendar […]!"

However, despite Raimundo’s keen interest in his past, he vehemently denies any such interest, again repeating his mantra that “era liquidar os seus negócios […] e por aqui é o caminho!”. This dubious denial then becomes arrogance and flippancy: “o tal passado! O passado, passado! Ora adeus!”, these words signalling precisely the imminent return of the repressed. Two contradictory forces thus govern Raimundo’s journey: the compulsion to return to his ancestral past, and his denial of any interest in doing so. When he says “Ora adeus!” to the past, we can almost hear the words of the naive Oedipus dismissing the prophet Tiresias — “Once gone, you will not trouble me again”.

Race, incest and Bumba-meu-boi: rethinking the Oedipal model

Having demonstrated, I hope, the ways in which Azevedo develops an Oedipal story in O Mulato, anticipating with his return to classical texts, like Eça after him, problems that would be explored in greater depth by Freud, I would now like to turn more specifically to how he adapts the model for the social milieu of nineteenth-century São Luís. I have gestured towards some such adaptations already: Ana Rosa’s passive temperament, for example, acquires a new significance in the context of an ancestral history of slavery represented by the mad slave mother, Domingas. As we shall see, these modifications to Sophocles’ model seek to articulate modes of kinship peculiar to Brazil, fashioned by colonialism and slavery, but they also point, at the level of narrative, to Azevedo’s tendency to write against the Naturalist movement as conceived in Europe.

Perhaps the most conspicuous modification to the Oedipal framework in O Mulato is the loosening of the degree of consanguinity in the central incestuous relationship, both in relation to Oedipus Rex and, retrospectively of course, Os Maias. Indeed, although I have been arguing that Raimundo and Ana Rosa are functionally siblings, as is stressed repeatedly in the text, they are nevertheless biologically cousins. We should read this not as an attempt to render their relationship more palatable to a prudish readership, but as a means to shift the focus onto questions of race that the European texts engage with only peripherally. It is, of course, only by removing consanguinity by one degree that Raimundo, in contrast to his cousin-sister, can carry the blood of black slaves,⁶⁴ such that Ana Rosa becomes, according to Maria Bárbara, “a primeira que na família sujava o sangue!” (p. 237). At the same time, restoring sibling relations in functional form preserves the intimacy of infancy, having lain dormant for decades, that precipitates a compulsive return to the lost “mother” in adulthood. It is a clever literary trick, one that (ab)uses the European model to move the goalposts of social commentary onto a Brazilian playing field. There is also, perhaps, something of Zola’s “experimental” approach here, proposed as the watermark of Naturalism in the preface to Thérèse Raquin, in Azevedo’s calculated adjustments to the variables of race and kinship.

---

By introducing the blood of slaves into the Oedipal family, Azevedo is able to develop a social-constructivist critique of racist thought. Being her cousin, carrying her uncle’s name and fortune, and yet deemed wholly unfit to marry her precisely because of his ancestry, Raimundo sits at the point in which the maranhense attitude towards race is seen at its most contradictory. Loosening a degree of consanguinity should lift the constraints of the incest taboo, but their marriage is nevertheless refused because of a conviction that their blood should not, like those of siblings, be mixed. In the terse words of Maria Bárbara, “Preto é preto! branco é branco! Nada de confusões!” (p. 243). However, it is just these “confusões” that Raimundo’s Oedipal discovery gradually threatens to expose. The fact that his appearance is racially ambiguous, aside from recreating the “blindness” that Tiresias attributes to Oedipus in relation to his identity, situates the problem of race within language.⁶⁵ If, according to Butler and as we saw in the introduction, Antigone’s struggle is one of recognition within the kinship system that reveals shortcomings in the latter’s terminology, Raimundo’s struggle is against the language and categories of race into which he is not “adequately” assimilated since, distanced from his family, his self-image does not correspond to his place in the symbolic order of Maranhão. Thus when he finally learns of his ancestry, he studies himself in the mirror in an unquenchable search for “truth”:

Em um destes passeios, parou defronte do espelho e mirou-se com muita atenção, procurando descobrir no seu rosto descorado alguma coisa, algum sinal, que denunciasse a raça negra.

---

⁶⁴ There is another kind of relationality, besides cousinship, that would allow for such a formulation, and that is if Raimundo were Ana Rosa’s half brother. This is the state of affairs in one of Azevedo’s so-called “pulp productions”, O Homem, in which Magdá gradually goes mad after her father forbids her from marrying her half brother, Fernando. Again, in this novel, the consanguinity of the half siblings is kept secret until they fall in love, and the incest taboo is called into question by Magdá’s father himself, who asks, “[n]ão seria tudo aquilo um crime maior do que os seus passados amores com a mãe de Fernando?… Sim; estes ao menos não se baseavam em preconceitos e vaidades, baseavam-se nos instintos e na ternura”. The novel loses some, though not all of its initial radical thrust as it follows Magdá’s “pathological” descent into madness, but it is nonetheless interesting as another instance in which Azevedo experiments with the greyer areas of the incest taboo. See Aluísio Azevedo, O Homem (Rio de Janeiro: Livraria Garnier, 1923), p. 34.

⁶⁵ I am here following the reading of Daphne Patai and Murray MacNicoll, who ask, “Might not the function of the white-black character, suffering the stigma of race, be precisely to call into the question the entire system of coding… that sustains domination?” See introduction to Mulatto, p. 23.
Observou-se bem, afastando o cabelo das fontes; esticando a pele das faces, examinando as ventas e revistando os dentes; acabou por atirar com o espelho sobre a cômoda, possuído de um tédio imenso e sem fundo. (p. 228)

This passage echoes some of the darker reaches of fin-de-siècle thought, relating the moment in which Raimundo’s own ideas turn chillingly against himself; as he stretches his skin and examines his nostrils, he reproduces the contemporaneous fascination with medical-observational practices, enthusiastically applied to the study of race. Unsurprisingly, then, the more he observes himself, the less he is satisfied, until he throws the mirror onto the chest of drawers, his boredom “sem fundo” reflecting the perennial insufficiency of “scientific” racial discourse itself. Raimundo’s problem is not that he is mixed race, in any case far from obvious, but that he is coded as such by his kinsmen. Accordingly, his Oedipal discovery is the moment when, to use a Lacanian trope, the Imaginary is reconciled with the Symbolic or, in this case, when his self-image is belatedly assimilated into the racist order of his homeland. Or, in more earthly terms, when he ceases to be addressed as the respected “doutor”, as at the beginning, when he is greeted by “grandes apertos de mão”; and becomes “Um cabra! […]. É um filho da negra Domingas! alforriado à pia! É um bode! É um mulato!” (p. 304) — as Maria Bárbara addresses him at the end. Indeed, one could go as far to suggest that Raimundo’s most significant discovery in O Mulato is not of who he is, but of who others see him as. This is why Diogo has him assassinated, as he threatens to expose race as the social construction on which the white elite of São Luís precariously depend.

One key way in which Azevedo modifies the Oedipal model, then, is to displace incest with race as the central concern, Antigone’s claim becoming Raimundo’s struggle against a symbolic order that cannot accommodate him. At this point I would like to introduce another current in O Mulato that I do not know to have been explored by critics: Azevedo’s engagement with the now-famous maranhense myth, Bumba-meu-boi, here juxtaposed with the myth of Oedipus. The festival of Bumba-meu-boi is a dazzling display of cultural hybridity, developed amongst slaves in 66 Diogo, in fact, ever in defence of the status quo, is perhaps the only character who demonstrates understanding of race as a social construction, more so even than Raimundo. As he tries to convince Dias to shoot Raimundo at the end, he mentions Ana Rosa’s developing baby, “já se sabe, parecida com o pai…” (p. 307), arguing that as long as Raimundo lives, the child will seek his true father — like Raimundo himself of course, as Azevedo hints at the possibility of tragic repetition through the generations. However, Diogo then implies that if Raimundo is killed, the true father of the child matters not the least, the pregnancy being, on the contrary, an advantage: “vejamos agora o que sucederá se você seguir o meu conselho: A rapariga chora por algum tempo, pouco, muito pouco, porque eu a consolarei com as minhas palavras; depois como precisa de um pai para o filho, casa-se com você, e aí está o meu amigo, de um dia para outro, feliz, rico, independente!” (p. 310). The child dies when Ana Rosa miscarries, and so this outcome is foreclosed, but it stands that Diogo realises that race is ultimately defined at the level of discourse, and not skin colour.

---

colonial Brazil, and incorporating aspects of African, Indian and Christian traditions. There are many variations to the story and the festival is celebrated widely around Brazil, but it is most closely associated with Maranhão where, between 1861 and 1868 — Azevedo’s childhood — it was prohibited, dismissed by contemporaries as “the stupid immoral merrymaking of slaves.” Today, vast processions fill the streets of São Luís in the months of June and July to celebrate the festival. The general storyline is as follows: the slave Pai Francisco lives with his pregnant wife, Mãe Catarina, on a fazenda owned by a Portuguese immigrant, usually known simply as Amo. Mãe Catarina develops cravings for ox tongue, or língua de boi, and will only be satisfied by eating the tongue of the finest bull on the fazenda. Worried for his wife and the unborn child, Pai Francisco leads Amo’s favourite ox into the woods, kills it and gives the tongue to his wife, who cooks and eats it, while the rest of the animal is divided amongst the slaves. The master, noticing the missing bull the next day, sends for his slaves and caboclos, one of whom, having missed out on the bounty of meat, tells Amo that he saw Pai Francisco leading the bull away into the forest. The ox’s carcass is found, provoking Amo’s wrath, who orders Pai Francisco to resuscitate the bull or face death himself. A Portuguese doctor tries to bring the animal back to life, but to no avail. Finally, an Amerindian healer arrives and successfully restores the bull’s life, all are forgiven, and the miracle is celebrated through the night. In another, somewhat “queerer” version of the story, Francisco and Catarina flee in terror, returning regretfully only years later after learning of their master’s continuing grief. Their son blows into the anus of the bull and his life is restored.

The myth of Bumba-meu-boi thus draws on a range of traditions, but perhaps the most salient structurally is Christian mythology, transported to the environment of the Brazilian fazenda, with the língua de boi analogous to the forbidden fruit with which Eve tempts Adam to break the Father’s Law. The resurrection of the bull leads to the forgiveness of the lovers’ sins and and they can once more serve their “father” faithfully. But just as O Mulato twists the Oedipal story to problematise race, so does the myth of Bumba-meu-boi adjust the structure of Christian mythology to account for a different configuration of the patriarchal family, inflected with the economics of slavery. If, as Eugene Genovese argues in relation to the Southern United States, the nineteenth-

---

70 Anonymous journalist, cited by Fryer, p. 75.

71 This version of story is taken from Fryer, p. 75.

72 This version is taken from http://bumba-meu-boi.info/a-lenda.html (accessed 17/11/16).
century slave-owning household functions as a one whole “family, white and black”, with slaves and young children both subject to the corrective measures of their “parents”, a dynamic outlined similarly in Gilberto Freyre’s Casa Grande e Senzala, it is not difficult to view Bumba-meu-boi, with its origins as a form of resistance amongst slaves “to denounce and ridicule colonial slave owners”, as a refocusing of the Christian patriarchal tradition to bring into view the specific patriarchal abuses of the fazenda. As such, it becomes ripe for juxtaposition with the Oedipal story developed in O Mulato, itself adjusted to account for the dynamics of slavery and its aftermath.
The parallel is drawn both structurally and in textual references, the most significant of these being the words of a travelling sertanejo during the local festas juninas who, after directing his verses at specific characters at a dinner party as he collects his tips, withdraws mysteriously:

E virou de costas e retirou-se, a dançar, cantando uma passagem
do Bumba-meu-boi:

Isto não, isto não pode sê.
Isto não, isto não pode sê
A filha de meu amo casar com você! ..
O caboclo me prendeu,

Meu amor!
Foi tão certa da razão, Coração!
Que o cabo...

E perdeu-se nas fundas sombras do mangueiral a voz do sertanejo e o som da viola. (p. 149)

The two verses, which appear to be Azevedo’s own, perhaps transcriptions or interpretations of words the author himself heard, explicitly purport to draw on the myth of Bumba-meu-boi and clearly echo the relationship of Raimundo and Ana Rosa, the “filha do amo” whose love “tão certa” for her cousin leads fatefully to his assassination. Importantly, this period of festivity in São Luís, which includes Bumba-meu-boi, celebrated by the lower classes at the time and thus heard later

---

75 Mukuna, cited by Fryer, p. 74.
by Raimundo only as “um sussurro longínquo de Bumba-meu-boi” (p. 174), is also of pivotal structural importance in the novel, being the moment when he resolves to ask Manuel for his cousin’s hand in marriage and, at the same time, when Diogo and Maria Bárbara discover from his belongings that he is not a Christian, leading them to the conclusion that “[é] preciso pôr esse homem fora de cá!” (p. 184). The festival of forbidden passions, Bumba-meu-boi, marks the moment in the novel that Raimundo goes against his uncle’s wishes and assumes his love for Ana Rosa, securing his fate within the family.

I mentioned above that there is an air of mystery to the sertanejo’s musical withdrawal, which we can see in the ellipsis of the final syllable of the word caboclo, lost in the “fundas sombras do mangueiral”. This not only adds a certain semantic weight, or sense of intrigue to the episode, but is part of a wider narrative current in O Mulato whereby the apparently Naturalist outlook is undercut by a fascination with myth and mystery — in short, with the metaphysical, an epistemological system that the positivist agenda of Naturalism and Realism resoundingly dismissed, or claimed to dismiss. Just as the incorporation of Bumba-meu-boi seeks to articulate kinship trouble in O Mulato in peculiarly Brazilian terms, echoing, perhaps, the Nationalist efforts of contemporaneous figures such as Silvio Romero who collated songs and stories of Brazilian folklore,76 so does it stand, alongside other myths in the novel, in opposition to the Naturalist pursuit of absolute truth.

There are many instances in O Mulato in which the metaphysical counteracts the supposedly enlightening Naturalist perspective, particularly where the abandoned fazenda of São Brás is concerned, the geographical point upon which the secrets of the past converge. When Diogo attributes Dona Quitéria’s death to an “espírito maligno que se lhe havia metido no corpo”, covering up José da Silva’s murder, São Brás becomes shrouded in superstition, “criou a sua lenda e foi aos poucos ganhando a fama de amaldiçoada” (pp. 56-7). Domingas, the slave mother who turns mad after the worst excesses of torture, becomes phantasmagoric: “[a]nos depois, contavam que nas ruínas de São Brás vivia uma preta feiticeira, que, por alta noite, saía pelos campos a imitar o canto da mãe-da-lua” (p. 68). The mãe-da-lua, or urutau, is a nocturnal bird with a frightful appearance native to the hottest regions of the Americas. According to legend, the bird’s haunting call is the voice of an Indian tribeswoman mourning her lover, killed by her father in an act of jealousy. In the Peruvian Amazon, meanwhile, the urutau’s call is said to be that of a baby abandoned by a tribe so as not to die from an impending plague, forever crying for its mother.77 Both stories resonate in O Mulato, where Raimundo searches for his lost mother and is subsequently murdered at the hands of the townsfolk to prevent his marriage to Ana Rosa. The mãe-da-lua, already incorporated into the mythology of São Brás by the people of Maranhão, appears in the novel on the night that Raimundo sees (without recognising) his mother for the first time, the eve of his visit to his ancestral fazenda:

76 See, for example, Silvio Romero’s 1883 work, Cantos populares do Brasil (São Paulo: José Olympio, 1954), in which he brings together popular songs from his homeland.

O silêncio era completo; de repente, porém, a uma nota harmoniosa de contralto sucederam-se outras, prolongadas e tristes, terminando em gemidos.

O rapaz impressionou-se; o canto parecia vir de uma árvore fronteira à casa. Dir-se-ia uma voz de mulher e tinha uma melodia esquisita e monótona.

Era o canto da mãe-da-lua. O pássaro levantou vôo, e Raimundo o viu então perfeitamente, de asas brancas abertas, a distanciar seus gorjeios pelo espaço. Considerou de si para si que os sertanejos tinham toda a razão nos seus medos legendários e nas suas crenças fabulosas. Ele, se ouvisse aquilo em São Brás lemar-se-ia logo, com certeza, do tal pássaro que canta a finados. Segundo a indicação do guia, continuava a pensar, a tapera amaldiçoada ficava justamente para o lado que tomara a mãe-da-lua. Devia ser naquelas baixas, que dali se viam. Não podia ser muito longe, e ele seria capaz de ir lá sozinho... Veio distraí-lo destas considerações um frouxo vozear misterioso, que lhe chegava aos ouvidos de um modo mal balbuciado e quase indistingível. Prestou toda a atenção e convenceu-se de que alguém conversava ou monologava em voz baixa por ali perto. Quedou-se imóvel a escutar. Não havia dúvida! Desta vez ouvira distintamente! Chegara a apanhar uma ou outra palavra! Mas, onde diabo seria aquilo?... (pp 206-7)

I have quoted this passage at length because it demonstrates neatly the opposing forces of myth and reason in O Mulato. On the one hand, the strange bird becomes, within the novel, a narrative realisation of the local myths surrounding São Brás, its call heard ominously on the eve of his great discovery. The narrator thus indulges in the air of mystery: words such as “esquisita”, or “frouxo vozear misterioso”, stand clearly in contrast to the supposedly demystifying language of Naturalism. Meanwhile, the use of the verb “parecer” in “o canto parecia vir de uma árvore fronteira à casa”, and the conditional “dir-se-ia”, establish limits in the narrator’s perspective that darken the reader’s vision. However, Raimundo seems relatively unfazed by the incident, quickly reasserting his perceived superiority of reason. “Considerou de si para si” suggests an exclusive epistemological standpoint in his contemplation of the incident, contrasted clearly with that of the maranhenses, who develop “medos legendários” and “crenças fabulosas”. When he concludes that they have “toda a razão” in their beliefs, it is not to concede that they are in any way “true”, but to assert the supremacy of his “enlightened” perspective, without which the myths could not be “properly” understood. Raimundo’s position is thus similar to that of the young Eça, determined to show society its “falsas interpretações e falsas realizações”. Two epistemological currents run through the novel: the power of myth and the metaphysical, working to hide the traumas of the past, and that of positivist ideas, represented by Raimundo, working to uncover them. Note, however, that the narrator makes use of both, often slipping into the language of secrecy and legend, and structuring the story in line with local myths, “numa curiosa mistura,” as Cândido identifies with the use of allegory in O Cortiço, “de lucidez e obnubilação.”

Conclusions on O Mulato: narrative dialectics and the triumph of Maranhão

It is here, in Azevedo’s curious use of myth alongside the Naturalist method, that we arrive at the correspondences between the movement of the narrative and the position of the author in relation to the Naturalist tradition. At this point I wish to part with a claim that runs consistently through criticism of O Mulato: that Raimundo is an idealised character, transcending the dictates of degeneration theory, affirming the strategy of branqueamento and designed to elicit the sympathy of readers. The deployment of myth and legend in O Mulato is, crucially, narratologically uneven, shared by the narrator in his enthusiastic appropriation of Bumba-meu-boi and the mãe-da-lua, and broadly by the superstitious residents of Maranhão, but not by Raimundo, who reacts to myth with a mixture of amusement, derision, boredom and indifference. As we have seen, he mocks Maria Bárbara’s claim that Ana Rosa is victim of a curse. Later, too, he displays mortal tedium when listening to Freitas, a family friend, describe the local festas juninas that incorporate those of Bumba-meu-boi. At the first sign of a conversation in this direction, which ends up lasting several pages (pp. 89-95), Raimundo lies about having read a folhetim on the subject to avoid elaboration. When this fails, he complains of being too hot, which backfires as Freitas leads him away onto the balcony. His subsequent behaviour exudes impatience: “Raimundo ria-se por delicadeza, e espreguiçava-se na cadeira, bocejando”. “Raimundo soltou um suspiro profundo e mudou de posição”. “Raimundo quis levantar-se; o outro obrigou-o a ficar sentado, pondo-lhe as mãos nos ombros”. “—Ah! gemeu Raimundo”. He shows no interest in the local traditions, his behaviour at risk of seeming arrogant. Similarly, when Manuel asks him, on the journey to São Brás, whether he prays, “Raimundo não pôde conter uma risada”. The true conflict of ideas in O Mulato is not, perhaps, between the narrator and the people of Maranhão, as suggested by criticism that claims the novel’s “extremely combative spirit” reflects the author’s disdain for his native province, but between an “enlightened” Raimundo and his conservative compatriots, with the narrator adopting an ambivalent position, in which a fascination with local history and myth undercuts the

---

78 Cândido, p. 115.

79 For the most prominent proponent of this reading, see Marchant, “Naturalism, Race, and Nationalism…”, in which she describes Raimundo as privileged uniquely with a “positive portrayal”, being an “enlightened national type” (p. 448).

80 MacNicoll, p. 239.

81 Loos, p. 44.
recognisably Naturalist style, challenging the supposedly superior epistemological perspective of the positivist protagonist.\textsuperscript{82}

The novel’s questioning of Naturalist principles is further evidenced in the above passage detailing the appearance of the \textit{mãe-da-lua}, where, despite Raimundo’s recourse to and faith in his reason, the myth ultimately gets the better of him as he is compelled to follow the the nightbird’s call, interrupted only by the murmur of hushed voices in the night. “Ele seria capaz de ir lá sozinho…” Indeed, whatever Raimundo’s efforts, in nineteenth-century Brazil, myth is the form of interpretation that ultimately wins out against science.\textsuperscript{83} When Raimundo is murdered like his father, history repeats itself — contrary to Hegel’s proclamations, of course — and by the following morning the circumstances of his death are being wildly distorted: “[c]ontava-se o fato de mil modos; inventavam-se lendas, improvisavam-se romances”. For Casusa, a family friend, “aquilo fora, nada mais, nada menos, do que um suicídio, e […] Raimundo viera até à porta da rua nas agonias da morte” (p. 319). For all his positivist education, Raimundo is powerless in his fight against the tide of myth and legend that smothers his past and into which he himself is ultimately assimilated. Thus when he is on the cusp of discovering the truth surrounding his father’s murder and confronts Cônego Diogo, demanding “[v]á dizer-me quem matou meu pai!”, he cowers before his appearance of sanctity:

Raimundo, com efeito, estava imóvel. Ter-se-ia enganado?… À vista do aspecto sereno do cônego chegara a duvidar das conclusões dos seus raciocínios. Seria crível que aquele velho, tão brando, que só respirava religião e coisas santas, fosse o autor de um crime abominável?… E, sem saber o que decidir, atirou-se a uma cadeira, fechando a cabeça nas mãos. (p. 233)

His education and apparently broader world view are still no match for Diogo’s ability to breathe and manipulate much older, epistemological systems — the cultural weight of Christianity, in this case, but also the power of myth and superstition in others. Even if Raimundo has morality on his side, and Cônego Diogo is the unambiguous villain of the story, the author does not, apparently, display great faith in the efficacy, in Maranhão at least, of his protagonist’s philosophy.

\textsuperscript{82} I do not wish to claim, of course, that Azevedo’s novel is in any way a defence of Maranhão’s provincial ways: on the contrary, the criticism of its widespread racism, as a case in point, is particularly elaborate, and the author’s derision for his compatriots is more than evident in his preface to the third edition (see \textit{O Mulato}, pp. 11-14). However, at the level of discourse and ideas, \textit{O Mulato} nonetheless appears to incorporate elements from both province and metropolis in its search for a Brazilian narrative voice.

\textsuperscript{83} One of most comic, and no less fine examples of the problematic reception of science in \textit{O Mulato} is when Freitas mentions the \textit{Cucurbitaceae} family of vegetables, to which the senile Dona Amância, “a sentir o cheiro de uma intriga”, replies, “Ah! são estrangeiros!… Já sei, já sei! é uma família de bifes, que está morando no Hotel da Boavista! É certo, agora lembro que ainda estoutrdia uma sujeita ruiva… deve ser mulher ou filha do tal…” (p. 160).
The reasons for such mistrust on the part of the author, reflected in the dialectical movement of the narration, are best considered by returning to the problems of the economic system that shaped the contemporaneous culture of misplaced ideas. As I signalled earlier, Raimundo embodies the dilemma of ideias fora do lugar not only due to his European ways of dressing and thinking in the sleepy province of Maranhão, but because every facet of his education since leaving Brazil as a child, including his refined fashion sense, depend nevertheless on the spoils of slavery. Inheritor of his father’s wealth, amassed from the continued trafficking of African slaves, Raimundo’s disdain for the “mesquinhos escúpulos” (p. 222) of his compatriots seems culturally precarious, hypocritical even, made all the more so by his failure to contemplate the origins of his privilege. Indeed, Raimundo expresses disinterest, on a conscious level, in all aspects of his heritage, from the traditions of his homeland to his mysterious family history of slavery and the slave trade which, as we have seen, he disavows with his insistence that his sole purpose is to liquidate his ill-gotten capital and leave Maranhão forever. Perhaps, allegorically speaking, Raimundo represents not the new Brazilian but the disdainful European, quick to criticise the “backwardness” of the New World, but quietly forgetting his dependency upon it. In this sense, he is no greater bearer of meaningful change than the Portuguese characters in the novel, including Dias and Manuel Pescada, who are motivated almost entirely by profit, distinguished only thinly from the mass of unfavourably portrayed Portuguese capitalists in São Luís, seen dragging their “grandes barrigas” around the city warehouses. Either way, Raimundo’s lack of patience for local customs and avowed devotion to new ideas, despite his wealth deriving from slavery, aligns him more easily with the coloniser than the colonised. And it is here that we can explain the curiously ambivalent position of the narrator in O Mulato: familiar with new ideas, perhaps even admirer of them, but fascinated too with local custom and phobic towards the exploitative European, the narrator is constructed as a (white) Brazilian vis-à-vis his “European” protagonist. In the process, the Naturalist vision is coloured with the lens of local myth — shunned by the positivist Raimundo — whilst European cultural loans, including that of Oedipus (itself anti-Naturalist in its tragic repetition, of course), are adapted to articulate the specificities of the more peripheral experience of Brazil, still shackled to its dark colonial past. Naturalism, in other words, is reconfigured to construct a Brazilian voice whose authority stems as much from the deployment of Patai and MacNicoll, for example, argue that O Mulato “portrays the continuing prominence of Portuguese immigrants in Maranhão”. See Introduction to Mulatto, p. 10.

Obesity is clearly used as an often xenophobic trope of degeneracy in O Mulato, typically used to mark exploitative capitalists. Already in the opening pages, “[v]iam-se deslizar pela praça os imponentes e monstruosos abdomens dos capitalistas” (p. 19). The Portuguese in particular are stereotyped as fat and interested only in capital. The enormous, floor-shuddering Lindoca, meanwhile, who balloons over the course of the novel, is described in the terms of a farm animal with “banhas”, her nose likened to a “lombinho” (pp. 79-80). Gradually confined to the household, she becomes an allegory for the immobility of Maranhense society.
“science” as it does from folklore and the rejection of the supremacy of European ideas. This is Azevedo’s naturalismo nos trópicos that appropriates, twists and complements the inherited model.

In her reading of O Mulato, drawing on MacNicoll and Patai, Marchant asks whether Maranhão, with its fierce climate that destroys European complexions, creating an atmosphere of stifling immobility might not be “the true protagonist of the novel”. Indeed, one wonders whether Maranhão is not just the protagonist but the ultimate victor in O Mulato, both within the novel’s storyline, and at the structural and narratological level, the Naturalist style becoming infused with local colour that tentatively mocks the movement as conceived in Europe and represented by Raimundo. I mentioned earlier that theories of race and degeneracy, in Brazil especially, engaged closely with questions of heredity and environment, pitted against each other in the course of the individual’s destiny. In O Mulato, despite an intense preoccupation with ancestry and heredity, perhaps unrivalled in any Brazilian work from the period, it is the environment, arguably, that wins out in the end — not just because the social order of Maranhão is restored in the final chapter, but because the narrator, metaphorically speaking, is seduced by the haunting call of the mãe-da-lua.

If Azevedo’s Naturalism is an inherited one, the author counters the power of his heritage by emphasising the cultural power of his homeland. Thus O Mulato, in contrast to its fora-do-lugar protagonist, adapts the ideas to the place. To disentangle the ties of kinship in O Mulato is to journey through the natural and cultural history of Maranhão. To approach this journey as Raimundo, returning to reclaim his slave money with the eyes of a modern, cosmopolitan liberal, is to repeat the mistakes of the past, including those of his father who, in a chilling parallelism, flees the then-state of Grão-Pará in 1831 to avoid execution by his slaves in the Setembrada revolts against slavery and absolutism. He settles “incólume” in Maranhão with his booty — “conseguia sempre salvar algum ouro” — and past evils are buried. His son, in turn, sets out to leave Maranhão with the same fortune a generation later. Here we are surely reminded of the words of Freud from 1914: “the patient does not remember anything of what he has forgotten and repressed, but acts it out. He reproduces it not as a memory but as an action; he repeats it, 86 Cândido identifies a similar current in O Cortiço where, he argues, the narrator occupies the precarious position of the white Brazilian, quick to profess his racial superiority over the black protagonists, but hateful of the European, who works no harder than the Brazilian but who nevertheless “acaba mais rico e mais importante”. See Cândido, p. 117.

87 The young, pale Portuguese boy, Gustavo de Vila Rica, is found “mudado” at the end of the novel, losing his “belas cores europeias” and becoming pock-marked with venereal disease (p. 325).

88 The opening paragraph moves from the description of the “dia abafadico e aborrecido” to the city of São Luís, “entorpecido pelo calor”; “as árvores nem se mexiam”; “não se encontrava viva alma na rua” (p. 17).

89 Marchant, p. 448.
without, of course, knowing that he is repeating it”. The German by Joan Riviere, in The Standard Edition of the Complete Works of Sigmund Freud, (London: Hogarth Press, 1950), vol. 12, pp. 145-157 (p. 150). In the case of O Mulato, it is not possible that Raimundo remembers the events of his father’s escape from Grão-Pará, lived prior to his birth, although he nonetheless spends his infant years on the fazenda, witnessing both considerable wealth and the corresponding abuse of slaves, including his own mother. I thus deploy this Freudian insight here in a slightly augmented sense, to stress the manner in which the traumas of the past return to disrupt the present when not sufficiently addressed or recognised.

91 “—Não me toques! gritava o moço, com raiva, levantando o chicote” (p. 216, emphasis added).

93 Roberto Schwarz mentions this example in “Misplaced Ideas…”, including some highly charged barbs by nineteenth-century Brazilians on the matter. See Schwarz, p. 19. A modern-day parallel is all too compelling: the extraction and export of fossil fuels by countries who promote domestic use of renewable energy.
The dis-solution of the family: kinship and allegory in Casa de Pensão

O Mulato is unique amongst Azevedo's novels for its concern with ancestry and heritage, but already environment is presented as a significant counterweight to its influence. When we move forward chronologically through his work, the balance shifts still further and environment takes centre stage, made manifest by the titles of his subsequent most "significant" novels, Casa de Pensão (1884) and O Cortiço (1890), which displace O Mulato's overt concern with ancestry with a pointed focus on space and place. If Azevedo disengages somewhat with questions of biological ancestry, however, he does not move away from questions of kinship, but rather undoes their apparent foundations in blood ties, constructing allegorical "families" whose fragile cohesion owes more to bonds of shared environment and economic convenience than consanguinity. There are aspects of O Mulato that anticipate this trajectory. As we have seen, Azevedo splinters the kinship function from biological ties when he seeks to represent Raimundo as effectively his cousin's brother. Ana Rosa, too, finds a functional mother in her mãe-pretinha, Mônica, whilst Mariana, her biological mother who dies when she is still a child, figures as a functional mother for Raimundo. Mothers, fathers, sisters, cousins and aunts, in short, need not be biological to serve their societal functions, an insight shared later by Lacan, who abstracted Freudian notions of father and mother to position them as structuring forces in the subject's psyche. This insight will underscore my subsequent analysis of Casa de Pensão, where I examine how Azevedo allegorises a profitable Rio guesthouse as an unhappy family and indeed Brazil itself, stretching — queering? — the kinship system over the contours of economic and international relations to expose their complicities. Again, Azevedo writes against Naturalist discourse, this time with the mystifying force of allegory that adduces a further layer of signification and pressures the representation of the family as "natural". Thus whilst I take several cues from Cândido's work on the use of allegory in O Cortiço, which he identifies as Azevedo's most salient adaptation to Zola's model, I wish to focus more specifically on the allegorisation of family and kinship in Casa de Pensão where, as in O Mulato, an exploration of the normative structure of the family is reflected in something "queer" at the level of the text.

---

94 See Loos, pp. 40-41.

95 Here I am therefore developing the insights of Berta Waldman in her introduction to Casa de Pensão, in which she argues that "a casa de pensão guarda em si relações familiares, só que desencadeadas mediante pagamento", a dynamic that she relates to the tensions between Romanticism and Naturalism in the novel. See Waldman, pp. 6-7.

Azevedo’s second major work, again received with great popularity at the time, has nevertheless attracted far less critical attention than O Mulato and O Cortiço. Indeed, there is very little structural analysis of Casa de Pensão at all, with the fortunate exception of an article by Angela Fanini, to which I will return shortly. The novel tells the story of Amâncio, a young, wealthy maranhense representing the older slave-owning classes, who settles in Rio de Janeiro to study medicine. He is quickly marked as an excessively Romantic type, “um sonhador, um louco” (p. 22), provoked by the harsh, authoritarian rule of his Portuguese father and the blissful refuge he finds in his indulgent mother. Living initially in the house of Campos and his wife Hortênsia, old family friends, he quickly longs for greater freedom and establishes himself in the guesthouse of João Coqueiro and his older, French wife, Madame Brizard, whom he meets early in his studies. Whilst they claim to have their “friend’s” best interests at heart, in secret they covet his money and in particular his hand in marriage to Coqueiro’s sister, Amélia, a match that would lift the trio from relative poverty and recover their past riches. Despite a promising start, the plot fails as Amâncio appears more interested in Hortênsia and the guest Lúcia, both married women, leaving Coqueiro and Madame Brizard increasingly exasperated in their matchmaking efforts. Coqueiro sues Amâncio in court, accusing him of seducing his sister only to refuse marrying her. The case, which clearly echoes that of the Questão Capistrano of 1876, is ruled in Amâncio’s favour, but in a characteristically dramatic finale, Coqueiro murders him, the final scene depicting Amâncio’s distraught mother finding her son’s bloodied corpse on a visit from Maranhão.

Fanini’s reading of the text identifies a “movimento pendular” between Romantic and Naturalist ideas in Casa de Pensão, a tension beginning with the opposing attitudes of Amâncio’s mother and father, traceable through his passionate love affairs that conflict with Coqueiro’s calculating, rationalist approach to their “friendship”, and resolved tragically in murder at the end. Particularly compellingly, Fanini demonstrates this pendular movement within the narrative, the narrator at once idealising maternal love and representing paternal authority with the lens of supposed objectivity. She sets this dialectic in the context of the clash of economic models present in Brazil at the time, one based on slavery, which she associates with Romanticism, and the other on free-market capitalism, associated with Naturalism and the

---

99 Capistrano was a student murdered by the brother of his former lover. The judicial case caused great sensation in Rio at the time. See Fanini, pp 34-5. As with O Barão de Lavo, there is an engagement here with contemporary “crimes of passion”.

100 Ibid., p. 48.

101 Ibid., p. 41.
bourgeoisie. This latter model leads inexorably (as we saw in Eça’s works) to a “mercantilização das relações sociais”, which sees Amâncio’s provincial innocence consistently exploited for financial gain. With this backdrop of “pendular” narration between Naturalism and Romanticism (not dissimilar to the surprising use of myth in O Mulato), I would like to turn to the allegorisation of kinship. Allegory, after all, is itself characteristic of Romanticism, not least in Brazil, where Alencar’s Iracema presents the romance between the Portuguese Martim and the Indian virgem dos lábios de mel as the foundational moment of the Brazilian nation.

It is thus possible to bring together the readings of Cândido and Fanini that seek out Azevedo’s adaptations to Zola’s model. However, again taking allegory to be a two-way street between signifiers and signifieds, rather than reproducing what Paul de Man identifies as “the asserted superiority of the symbol over allegory”, I hope to show how the allegorical plane pressures the integrity of its own symbolic system — in this case, the normative family.

The title of the novel, Casa de Pensão, introduces the dialectic that structures the subsequent allegorisation of kinship. On the one hand, “casa” signals the comforts of the family home, of rest, shelter and community. On the other, “pensão”, derived from Latin pensio, meaning “rent”, signals exploitation, profit and social division. The central relationships in Casa de Pensão contain this tension between the semblance of family and the “reality” of financial greed, beginning in earnest when Amâncio goes to live with Campos and his wife prior to meeting Coqueiro and Madame Brizard. On his arrival, Campos speaks to Hortênsia in private and tries to convince her of the need to “oferecer-lhe a casa” (p. 19) due to his indebtedness to Vasconcelos, Amâncio’s uncle:

É uma questão de gratidão!... Devo muitos obséquios à família deste rapaz! Lembras-te daquele velho, de que te falei, aquele que foi que me deu a mão lá no Norte?... Pois este é o sobrinho, é filho do Vasconcelos. Não nos ficaria bem recebê-lo assim, sem mais nem menos! (p. 20)

Receiving Amâncio is not the selfless act it might appear, but instead figures as a repayment for past favours. When Campos rejoins the room where Amâncio is waiting, however, he offers him some lighter clothing, invites him to join him for dinner and, finally, utters the words, “[v]enha para...

Ibid., p. 46.

cá; faça de conta que minha família é a sua!” (p. 21), urging him to stay at his house. He then acts in a consistently paternal manner towards Amâncio:

[O] Campos estava sempre a lhe moer o juízo com as matrículas, com a entrada na academia, com o inferno de obrigações a cumprir, cada qual mais pesada, mais antipática, mais insuportável!

—Olhe, seu Amâncio, que o tempo não espicha — encolhe!… É bom ir cuidando disso!… Repetia-lhe o negociante, fazendo ar sério e comprometido. —Veja agora se vai perder o ano! Veja se quer arranjar por aí um par de botas!… (p. 39)

Campos, in other words, does not just repay his “debt” to Vasconcelos by offering Amâncio board and lodging, but takes him into his “family”, declaring him a rightful member, and acting as a father towards him by reminding him repeatedly of his obligations, or the Law, with an “ar sério”. Amâncio’s juvenile irritation with this Law, meanwhile, is audible in the repetition in the phrase “mais pesada, mais antipática, mais insuportável!”. The pretense to a relationality of kinship, a day after meeting each other as strangers, is an exchange of services and not founded on authenticity, a dynamic not dissimilar to that of the “brotherly” relationships we saw in Os Maias in the previous chapter. However, in this apparently seamless complicity of “family” and economics, of casa and pensão, where the Father’s Law exercises tight control, cracks will soon emerge as kinship acquires increasingly allegorical meanings that contort the system itself.

The allegorical shift takes place when Amâncio establishes himself in Madame Brizard’s guesthouse. To begin with, the complicity of (pseudo-)kinship and economics continues with ease. Immediately, Amâncio is taken on as both a tenant and member of the “family”. When he first meets Coqueiro at an extravagant lunch for which he foots the bill, the latter tries to persuade him to move to the casa de pensão which, he insists, “não é um hotel, é uma — casa de família! Não temos hóspedes, temos amigos!” (p. 56), a claim that the novel’s title evidently undermines. When Amâncio arrives at the guesthouse, Coqueiro demands, “[p]õe-te à vontade, filho! […] em ar quase de censura” (p. 93), positioning Amâncio as son in the “family” not only lexically but in his mode of expression. Similarly, shortly afterwards, he remarks:

“Tu, aqui, não quero que sejas um hóspede, mas um amigo, um colega, um filho da família, uma espécie de meu irmão, compreendes? São dessas coisas que se não explicam — questão de simpatia! Conhecemo-nos de ontem e é como se tivéssemos sido criados juntos; em mim podes contar com um amigo para a vida e para a morte! (p. 103)

Coqueiro explicitly invokes kinship to try to demonstrate the sincerity of his emotion which is, of course, only cold calculation. Several such tropes are invoked — filiality, brotherhood, a shared upbringing, and eternal commitment — as Coqueiro establishes himself as the “father” of the house early on. “Serás tratado como um filho… Agora, quanto a certas visitas… […] isso, filho, tem paciência… Lá fora o que quiseres, mas daquela porta para dentro…” (p. 104). As in the traditional bourgeois family home represented by Campos and his wife, Coqueiro’s casa de pensão apparently has a strict sexual code enforced by the dono de casa; Amâncio is quickly positioned beneath the law. Coqueiro’s tactic which, as we shall see, will ultimately prove unsuccessful, is to treat Amâncio as a son, and indeed “uma espécie de irmão” (a brother can be many things, of course), with the exclusive desire of controlling his wealth. As he says to his wife after first meeting him, “[é] um achado precioso! […] é filho único e tem a herdar uma fortuna! […] a coisa vai para além de quatrocentos contos! […] se o metermos em casa e se conduzirmos o negócio com um certo jeito, não lhe dou três meses de solteiro!” (p. 88).

The law of the house, however, proves to be weak in Casa de Pensão, the appearance of a family order thinly disguising the lawlessness underneath. Thus Coqueiro, who prohibits amorous visits to the house “para a boa moral”, does not practise what he preaches, and is later spied by Amâncio leaving the house with “uma mulher gorda” (p. 153) at the dead of night. Amâncio, too, receives tiptoe visits from Lúcia, and alludes to Coqueiro’s hypocrisy when the latter reproaches him — “sei, tão bem como tu, que aqui nem todos são santos!” (p. 204). There is a generalised sense in Casa de Pensão that the house is not merely hypocritical, but a troubling, sometimes hideous distortion of the supposedly saintly bourgeois family. On the night that Amâncio catches his friend with his amante, the house descends into a hysterical argument about noise and indecency, provoked by the wakeful wife of the poor composer Mendes who, frustrated by her husband working into the small hours, demands that he turn out the light. “Deixa isso! Anda! E apaga o diabo dessa luz! [...] Arre, com os diabos! Que nem se pode dormir!” (p. 157). When he warns her calmly about the neighbours, she dismisses his words; “—Os vizinhos que se fomentem! Berrou ela, embrulhando-se na colcha e fazendo tremer o soalho com seus passos de granadeiro. — Não como em casa deles, não preciso deles para nada!” Her response epitomises the underlying individualism in Coqueiro’s supposed “casa de família”. Within minutes, a loud argument breaks out at three o’clock in the morning:

O moço do n.º 7 expectorou com mais força e pôs-se a geman.
— Ora, com um milhão de demônios! Gritou o guarda-livros, morava no n.º 6. — Não é possível sossegar neste inferno! Quando não é a tosse e o gemido da direita, é a rezinga e a briga da esquerda! Apre! Antes morar num hospital de doidos!
[...]
— Os incomodados são que os que mudam! — gritou ela.
[...]
Nesse momento, o Campela, o tal esquisitão do no.º 4, que até aí não dera sinal de si, levantou-se tranquilamente, tomou o seu clarinete, e começou por acinte, a tirar do instrumento as notas mais estranhas e atormentadores que se podem imaginar. O guarda-livros respondeu-lhe batendo com a bengala nas paredes de tabique e berrando, como um doido, o Zé Pereira.

Já pelas escadas, Amâncio ouviu as vozes do gentleman, do Melinho e de Lúcia, que acordaram espantados, e em gritos reclamavam contra semelhante abuso.

No andar de baixo, o Piloto, o Dr. Tavares, o Fontes, e a mulher, abriam as portas dos competentes quartos, para indagar que diabo queria aquilo dizer. […]

Amâncio já estava entre os lençois, quando o Coqueiro percorreu toda a casa, de robe-de-chambre e castiçal na mão.

[…]

O guarda-livros, no dia seguinte pela manhã, declarou a Mme. Brizard que se retirava da casa de pensão.

— Oh! Disse. — Não estava disposto a suportar por mais tempo aquele zungu! Os seus vizinhos eram uma gente impossível! — Não se passava uma noite em que não houvesse chinfrinada! (pp. 158-60)

In this passage, the weakness of the Father’s Law that ought to govern the structure of the family is seen in the collapse of the division between public and private. As Foucault argues in relation to the great institutions of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the creation and policing of sexuality during this period was realised in the configuration of space, with boys’ dormitories, for example, designed with curtains and partitions to prevent sexual contact whilst implicitly acknowledging its potential to arise. 106 In the episode above, the divisions between rooms, and even floors, break down, eliciting a scandalised response from the more prudish guests. As the bookkeeper, who leaves soon afterwards, succinctly puts it, “quando não é a tosse e o gemido da direita, é a rezinga e a briga da esquerda!”. That which ought to maintain the integrity of the public and private spheres fails on the night that Amâncio discovers that Coqueiro is committing adultery, and thus himself undermining the sexual-spatial code. Accordingly, Coqueiro paces hopelessly through “aquele zungu” in his dressing-gown, his phallic candlestick only a pretence to paternal authority. The narrator emphasises the increasing confusion of private and public space by identifying each character according to their room number, and using numerals, which adds to the sense in which the cacophony of voices and instruments cuts across and tears apart the supposedly rationalised space. As Coqueiro’s Law is gradually weakened, revealing itself as complicit in perpetuating a parentesco postiço that hides a chaotic sexuality and individualism underneath, there appears to be something rather “queer”, perhaps, about the casa de pensão.

The narrator himself seems to suggest such a possibility when he describes the upbringing of Amélia, Coqueiro's sister, where again the “family home” figures as a corrupting influence characterised by an excess of intimacy:

Amélia, por conseguinte, cresceu em uma — casa de pensão. Cresceu no meio da egoística indiferença de vários hóspedes, vendo e ouvindo todos os dias novas caras e novas opiniões, absorvendo o que apanhava da conversa de caixeiros e estudantes irresponsáveis; afeta a comer em mesa-redonda, a sentir perto de si, ao seu lado, na intimidade doméstica, homens estranhos, que se não preocupavam com lhe aparecer em mangas de camisa, chinelas e peito nu. (p. 79).

Here, the tension I identified earlier between casa and pensão comes to disturb the Father’s Law that ought to hold them together. On the one hand, there is an “egoística indiferença” on the part of the paying guests, who come and go with the times, having no qualms about appearing in public dressed in an informal attire that pushes the boundaries of the acceptable in front of a young lady — not scandalous, perhaps, but certainly suggestive, with chests, arms and feet on display. Here, however, we find the same “confusion” of space that characterises the episode of the argument, with the round table facilitating contact between strangers who, judging by their clothes at least, are not quite fit for the private sphere, or “intimidade doméstica”, as the narrator puts it. Their dissonance at her side is emphasised further with the almost tautological clauses “a sentir perto de si, ao seu lado, homens estranhos”, which also carry a sibilance suggestive of whisper and scandal. The complicity of casa and pensão, in other words, which Coqueiro uses consistently to attract guests, and which brings lodgers into the “intimidade doméstica”, results in a disturbance to the former in its services to the latter. Coqueiro’s mercantile approach to the guesthouse brings about the corruption of precisely the bourgeois family that he invokes as his business model.

This distortion of the bourgeois family is confirmed in the sterility of the “mother” and “father” of the house who, despite their symbolic roles, do not have children of their own. Queerer still, this sterility is due to Madame Brizard’s old age; at fifty, when she marries the much younger Coqueiro, a second-year student at the time, she is too old to have children. The great difference in age between husband in wife is viewed as distinctly odd by onlookers. Soon after meeting Coqueiro, “Amâncio jurava corresponder àquela amizade, mas, no íntimo, ria-se do Coqueiro, que agora lhe parecia tolo, e cujo casamento com a francesa velhusca o tornava, a seus olhos, cada vez mais ridículo” (p. 103), the pejorative suffix “—usca” indicating his disapproval of the intergenerational marriage. When Campos learns of Amâncio’s court case, he immediately blames himself for not foreseeing the calamity:

“Mas, onde diabo tinha eu esta cabeça, para não ver logo que um homem, que se casa especulativamente com uma velha do feitio de Mme. Brizard; um homem que consentir à irmã
It seems reasonable to suggest that Coqueiro’s marriage is perceived as “queer”, identified immediately as a primary reason to distrust him, echoing Foucault’s concept of the “will to know”, the odd difference in age taken as a privileged site for understanding Coqueiro’s character. And yet despite its queerness in the eyes of the bourgeoisie, it is precisely bourgeois interests that govern his marriage to Madame Brizard who, being the widow of a Parisian hotelier, presents herself as the ideal partner to relaunch the guesthouse that closed with the death of Coqueiro’s mother. “Toda a sua vida, todos os seus recursos, seriam empregados para o mesmo fim: facultar ao marido os meios de estudar, os meios de crescer, desenvolver-se, luzir” (p. 83). There is something distinctly motherlike in Madame Brizard’s desire to provide for Coqueiro’s “upbringing”. Choosing a capitalist mother for a wife, Coqueiro places commercial interests first, but in so doing, his marriage becomes a disturbed reflection of the patriarchal, bourgeois family, his Law weakened irreparably, with no sons to transmit his name and bloodline. Thus Madame Brizard does not take Coqueiro’s name at any point in the novel, but retains her nominal connection to the Parisian hotelier. As Coqueiro himself says, in earnest as much as in jest, “[s]ou casado […] Isso, porém, nada quer dizer” (p. 54).

In this curious “deformation” of the family, arising paradoxically from its complicities with the same capitalist order it ought to underpin, we arrive at the “queer” at the level of the text. There is without doubt a precedent within the Naturalist movement for “typological” characters such as Coqueiro and Madame Brizard, who approach all social relations with the principles of exchange. Particularly noteworthy in this respect is Octave Mouret from Zola’s Les Rougon-Macquart series who, in Au Bonheur des Dames, believes he will conquer the intransigent Denise with spiralling offers of money.107 However, Madame Brizard’s nationality, age and sterility invest the casa de pensão, with its comically diverse array of guests, with national-allegorical meaning. As I have indicated, the Brazilian Romantics often deployed allegory to create “foundational” myths of the Brazilian nation. But if, as Fanini neatly demonstrates, Casa de Pensão wavers between Romanticism and Naturalism, might this not be the point where the two reach a disastrous synthesis, in which the allegories of the former, forging family, nation and future, meet the cold, “rational” perspective of the latter which, in Brazil at least, was significantly associated with the new, mercantile classes, vehemently opposed to European influence?108

This distortion of the foundational family, which is also, in its recourse to allegory, a distortion of Naturalism itself, is perhaps best illustrated through a comparison with Alencar’s much-celebrated Iracema (1865), which I cited earlier as typifying the Brazilian Romanticist

---

108 See Brookshaw, p. 49.
“foundational” tradition. The novel, a “fantasy of American-European miscegenation”,\(^\text{109}\) tells the story of Martim, a Portuguese coloniser, his pitiguara friend, Poti, and Iracema, a tabajara girl with whom he falls in love, and who dies after giving birth to their child.\(^\text{110}\) The child of Martim and Iracema thus carries both European and, according to Maria Manuel Lisboa:

just enough Indian blood [...] to sustain the novel's status as foundation text, but not enough viably to secure the continuity of the line that died with his mother. Iracema, too, remains what she always was: sweet, fertile, destructible, and at the last dead.\(^\text{111}\)

If we compare the figures of Iracema and Madame Brizard, it is possible to observe a symmetrical inversion of the (misogynistic) representation of woman, typically dichotomised in Western culture as angel or whore. Iracema, representing the Indian line that was already all but extinct by the time of the novel's publication, is culturally sublimated, selfless, procreative, and ultimately dead. Madame Brizard, by contrast, represents the continuing European presence in Brazil, much maligned by the Naturalists and mercantile classes,\(^\text{112}\) and already criticised by Azevedo in O Mulato, a criticism he consolidates in the later O Cortiço, in which the miserly Portuguese capitalist, João Romão, constructs an exploitative empire in the form of a tenement in Rio de Janeiro.\(^\text{113}\) Madame Brizard thus epitomises the European's sense of superiority in relation to the New World — “Ah! Ela, a francesa, sabia perfeitamente como tudo isso se arranjava no Brasil” (p. 84), she remarks to Coqueiro as she plots the much-coveted “casamentão”. And being European, the “mother” of the story becomes everything that a mother ought not to be: calculating, businesslike, imposing — she is obese\(^\text{114}\) — and, finally, old and sterile. We will encounter a remarkably similar figure in Caminha’s Bom Crioulo in the following chapter. If Madame Brizard is placed against Iracema, the foundational allegories of the Romantics are inverted and rendered barren by the Naturalists’ close and “demystifying” attention to the social environment, still conspicuously absent of slaves in the case of Casa de Pensão, but unsurprisingly saturated with the meddling influence of Europe.

\(^{110}\) José de Alencar, Iracema (Rio de Janeiro: Edições BestBolso, 2012).

\(^{111}\) Lisboa, p. 98.

\(^{113}\) Aluísio Azevedo, O Cortiço (São Paulo, Editora Ática, 2005).

\(^{114}\) Madame Brizard’s greatest pride is her “rico pescoço”, “um grande pescoço pálido cheio de ondulações macias e fartas” (p. 80). The use of obesity here as a pejorative trope of greed and stagnation echoes that which we saw in relation to Lindoca and the Portuguese capitalists in O Mulato.
If Madame Brizard is taken as the allegorical, European (anti-)mother in Casa de Pensão, the other characters in the novel complete the picture. Amâncio, as Fanini demonstrates, represents the older, slave-owning classes from the provinces, lost and adrift in the cosmopolitan milieu of Rio de Janeiro. Coqueiro, deprived of his aristocratic fortune at a young age by his frivolous father, represents the new, republican bourgeoisie, abandoning the economic models of the past in the hope of making a fortune in business and, crucially, seduced by the French Republican fugitive, Madame Brizard. The great hope is that his sister Amélia will provide the child to secure the future viability of the family and its capital. However, despite her “gestozinhos passarinheiros” and pretence to “virtue”, she amounts to little more than the carrot dangled by Coqueiro and Madame Brizard to attract the prize, strictly instructed by the latter, prior to Amâncio’s arrival, to avail herself of “muita habilidade e alguma esperteza” with the aim of “apanhar um marido rico” (p. 89). With Amélia reduced structurally to an instrument of temptation in Casa de Pensão, a sterile triad emerges, a loveless love triangle encompassing Amâncio (old Brazil, slavery), Madame Brizard (the exploitative European) and Coqueiro (the “new” Brazilian nevertheless seduced — like Raimundo? — by the latter). Despite hopes that this triad will, with the impassive help of Amélia, become a happy family at the end, bringing together the conflicting classes and nationalities in fin-de-siècle Rio, the result is mutual destruction, with Amâncio murdered, Coqueiro arrested, and his guesthouse forever discredited.

There is an ideological deadlock, a pained stalemate of dominant classes and ideas, in Azevedo’s (anti-)foundational allegory of Rio society, where there are certainly no winners, except, unsurprisingly if not convincingly, Madame Brizard, who appears to be absent at Amâncio’s funeral, her name, in contrast to those of Amâncio and her husband, decidedly intact. The guesthouse is dissolved towards the end, with the (pseudo-)community of bookkeepers, bohemians, students, opportunistic lovers, foreigners and provincianos gradually moving elsewhere, either through choice or by force. But as the allegory develops in the meantime, drawing on and incorporating misogyny and xenophobia, two oppositional forces are set in motion that restore dynamism to the text. On the one hand, there is a movement from family to city and nation, from relations of kinship to relations of class and nationality, adducing an allegorical plane in a surprise departure from Naturalist principles. On the other, however, assuming that neither the family nor the nation is privileged as the signifier, there is a countermovement from the nation to the family, from

---

115 Louis Philippe’s ascension to the throne leads Monsieur Brizard and his wife to flee France for Brazil (p. 80).

116 Amélia’s somewhat two-dimensional character is thus similar to that of Ana Rosa and perhaps the majority of high-society women in Azevedo’s work. Marchant suggests on this basis that gender remains an “unexplored realm”, although two other novels, Filomena Borges and O Livro da Sogra, the latter a first-person narrative of an older lady sharing her thoughts on love and sex, are more complex in this respect. See, for example, Luis Filipe Ribeiro, “O Sexo e o Poder no Império: Philomena Borges”, in The Luso-Brazilian Review, Vol. 30, No. 1 (Summer, 1993), pp. 7-20.
(post)colonial and class relations to relations of kinship. And here the patriarchal family is pressured by its allegorical referent, recast as an anti-family, a sterile non-unit that reflects the excesses of free-market capitalism yoked to the stubborn presence of European power in Brazil. If the family of Casa de Pensão is to be considered “queer”, it is equally bound up with something queer at the textual level, that is, the recourse to national allegory by the ostensibly Naturalist narrative. On the one hand, Azevedo inverts the mystifying allegories of the Romantics in the novel, shifting the focus onto the continuing abuses of the present day. But in so doing, he could not but subvert the patriarchal family itself, exposing its inescapable internal contradiction, whereby its services to the accumulation and transmission of capital lead to the precise conditions for a foreclosure of patrilinear inheritance. At the beginning, perhaps, to cite a contemporaneous work that draws heavily on allegory, the family shows the smiling face of the ageless Dorian Gray; at the end, we see its grotesque portrait after it has sold its soul. However, in Casa de Pensão, it is not just moral decadence and an erosion of values, but continuing European influence that rears its ugly allegorical head.

To see the family in Casa de Pensão as a non-foundational allegory one need only contemplate the single character who remains outside its net, Madame Brizard’s hysterical second daughter, Nini, whose husband dies young, inducing madness and compelling her to live with her mother. Nini shows no concern for the bourgeois sexual code, at one point entering Amâncio’s room and trying to smother him with kisses, much to his shock and dislike (“sentiu cair sobre ele um corpo gordo e mole” [p. 144]). Azevedo’s representation of the hysterical, however, differs from what one might expect from the period, with a consistent emphasis on the perversion of those who observe and analyse her. When she appears at the dinner table for the first time, “[u]m silêncio formou-se em torno de sua chegada; percebia-se que pensavam nela” (p. 109). Shortly before her arrival, the guests discuss possible cures for her ailment, with Sr. Lambertosa predictably citing the “fisiologistas” and proposing marriage as the miracle cure. She is repeatedly patronised as guests talk about her in the third person in her presence — “[p]ouco, Sr. Lambertosa, dê-lhe pouco!” (p. 113), orders Madame Brizard as he offers her the compote. “Vitima inocente dos impreenetráveis caprichos de Deus” (p. 143), affirms Dr. Tavares in her presence at subsequent dinner. The focus of the narration shifts from the hysterical to those who observe her, and as they attempt to circumscribe her experience, to locate her outside the symbolic order, an impenetrable autonomy is subtly restored. Nini’s stare provokes intense disconcertion:

118 The perversion of the “scientific” gaze in relation to the hysterical is arguably the central concern of the later O Homem, which has as its protagonist the hysterical Magdá, tended to by a heartless and authoritarian doctor and her well-meaning but helpless father. There is very little written about the novel in recent times, and insufficient space to discuss it in any detail here, but it serves nevertheless as a more developed example of Azevedo’s criticism of the potentially destructive application of “science” and paternal authority even as he reproduces many of its tenets.
Nini largou a colher no prato, sem dizer palavra, e pôs-se de novo a encarar para Amâncio, com um olhar tão dolorido e tão persistente, que o rapaz ficou impressionado.

E não lhe tirou mais a vista de cima. O estudante remexia-se na cadeira, importunado por aqueles dois olhos grandes, rasos, de um azul duvidoso, que se fixavam sobre ele, imóveis e esquecidos.

Disfarçava, procurava não dar por isso, nada, porém, conseguia. Os dois importunos lá estavam, sempre assentados sobre ele, a lhe queimar a paciência, como se fossem dois vidros de aumento colocados contra o sol.

— Que embirrância! Dizia consigo o provinciano. (p. 109)

Amâncio’s frustration, demonstrated both in free indirect discourse and in his restlessness when facing her inscrutable gaze, suggests that Nini sees something in him that he does not wish to be seen, and which perhaps even he himself cannot see, given the blinding metaphor that is employed in relation to her penetrative eyes. Her stare is invariably focussed on Amâncio in the novel; at one point, her eyes observe him “sem pestanejar” (p. 115). The narrative thus creates two contrasting perspectives: the reductive, “scientific” gaze of the guests, observing Nini, and the latter’s uncanny, mysterious ability to transcend their circumscription. That she consistently observes Amâncio, introduced himself as “um louco” by the narrator, instates an alternative epistemological axis that repudiates the bourgeois, “scientific” gaze and gestures towards an arrangement of relationships stripped of economic concerns and restored instead with passion, which is the governing principle of both Amâncio and Nini.

However, in trying to exclude Nini from the order of the casa de pensão, and by extension the (allegorical) order of the “new” city and nation, the guesthouse seals its fate, deafening itself to the chaotic clamour of human passion that ultimately engulfs it. Thus in a similar vein, Azevedo pinpoints the moment in Amâncio’s youth when he represses his non-normative urges, a decisive moment in an upbringing that sees his wild behaviour as a young child “domesticado”, according to his schoolmaster, in a particularly lucid display of bourgeois ideology. When he is just twelve, he declares to his family that he wants to join the navy; “[a] farda seduzia-o. Nada conhecia “tão bonito” como um oficial de marinha” (p. 32). His embarrassment, provoked by his mother who looks “em torno de si, chamando a atenção para o desembaraço do filho”, marks a turning point as he develops his veneer of conformity and impassiveness thinly hiding the “louco” underneath, a madness that only Nini can see.
Concluding remarks: Azevedo and the canon

My discussion, in this chapter, of two of Azevedo’s rather less studied novels, O Mulato and Casa de Pensão, and not the better-known O Cortiço, is partly strategic since it serves to show, I hope, the wealth of work by this remarkable author that is ripe for readings of the kind that Cândido performs, attentive to “deviant” writing practices, even when he himself describes the remainder of Azevedo’s novels as “geralmente mediocre”.119 I do not mean to dispute O Cortiço’s preeminence as his greatest novel, for it is without doubt the one that most convincingly problematises the diversity of Brazilian society, expanding the allegory of Casa de Pensão to include a fuller range of classes and races. Perhaps, however, Azevedo’s “lesser” novels have too often been “flattened” in critical readings, read against Zola’s precedents as a measure of “success”, as though the author had no mind or pen of his own, a literary automaton from an “inauthentic” culture. Instead, we should surely take Cândido’s cue and look at the points at which the “copy” does not measure up to the model. In both O Mulato and Casa de Pensão, these are perhaps the moments of greatest literary interest, when the blind spots of contemporaneous European discourses are enthusiastically brought to light in a culture marginalised by, but nevertheless implicated in them. Hence the liberal, abolitionist Raimundo’s disavowal of his dark family past; hence too the seductive, yet ultimately pernicious influence of the European in Casa de Pensão, disrupted by the terrifying stare of Nini. In a sense, the manifest limitation of Naturalist thought in Azevedo’s work — the recourse to myth, allegory and the metaphysical — works to articulate the uneven pressures of a burgeoning “global” capitalism, a theme surely no less relevant today than it was in the late nineteenth century. Azevedo’s less celebrated works remain strikingly insightful in this respect.

The Naturalist movement in Brazil, however, sowed the seeds for its relative unpopularity in the twentieth century with its penchant for racist, misogynist and xenophobic discourse.120 To put it simply, narrators’ descriptions of the overweight as farm animals, or of black women with “tetas opulentas”,121 are a far cry from what today is often termed the “politically correct”, and have rightly been called out by critics for their role in perpetuating what most now recognise as devastating stereotypes. However, if we delve beyond the surface of such language, and analyse the texts as a whole, it is evident that Azevedo in fact resisted naturalising representations of race, kinship, and even gender,122 even if he occasionally reproduced them, proving remarkably deft at questioning

119 Cândido, p. 112.

120 MacNicoll, for example, arguably forecloses a discussion of racial politics in O Mulato with his suggestion that such racialised discourse renders the novel unable to function as anything other than an “exposé of provincial pettiness”. See MacNicoll, p. 239.

121 Azevedo, O Mulato, p. 18.

122 Nini, Magdá and Filomena Borges are all characters that arguably disrupt the traditional representation of women; further study in this direction would doubtless prove fruitful.
these forms of relationality in society. Race and the patriarchal family in particular find no easy ideological home in his work, both presented in different ways as precarious, if powerful social constructs, the former in O Mulato, and the latter in Casa de Pensão, where Nini stares in isolation at the hypocrisy and emptiness of “family” values in a capitalist world, glimpsing a more visceral orientation of social relations. Curiously, then, an ostensibly white, male, normalising, “scientific” perspective ultimately forges a critique of the intertwining pillars that ought to sustain its authority: racial supremacy, the hegemony of bourgeois, patriarchal codes, and of course the institutions of “science” and literature, inasmuch as Romanticism, folklore and superstition disrupt Zola’s empirical experiment. Perhaps this shaking of the foundations should come as little surprise: after all, was it not market capitalism, colonialism and the naturalisation of racial-national “hierarchies” that, in the nineteenth century in particular, colluded to hold Brazil in a dependent position to the metropolitan centres whence these forces were unleashed?

There is one other way in which Azevedo’s Naturalism carries the watermark of its country, and here it seems pertinent to compare the structure of his Naturalist critique with that of Eça de Queirós. In many respects, there are striking similarities: both expose a parentesco postiço that raises the possibility of a different way of forging societal bonds, disrupting the kinship system in their critique of patriarchal capitalism. So too do they evidently view positivist thought, and by extension Naturalist writing, with a healthy pinch of scepticism. But in fact their critiques operate in contrary motion. Eça, in Os Maias at least, takes on kinship at its ideological root, exploring the semantic excesses and shortcomings of its signifying system. Normative kinship is picked apart on its own terms to critique the problematic mode of relationality that it engenders. In Casa de Pensão, however, the movement works in the opposite direction, with the critique of the contemporaneous socio-economic system — a hotchpotch of slavery, free markets and colonialism — reflected back allegorically in a “deformed” family. As such, Azevedo relies on stereotypes, which doubtless relates to his differing canonical position to Eça. Interestingly, however, despite ample commentary on Azevedo’s “copies” of O Crime do Padre Amaro and L’Assommoir, the possible influence of O Mulato on the preeminent Os Maias has not been entertained, which is probably symptomatic of the unidirectional manner in which transatlantic relations tend to be conceived, the reality proving somewhat more dynamic. In any case, the problematisation of the family in both O Mulato and Casa de Pensão is evidently bound up with an exploration of anti-Naturalist thought, including the myths and allegories of the Romantics, which in their turn disrupt the narrative to renegotiate the nexus of (European) structures of power. Here there is an unashamed willingness to borrow from a range of cultural traditions so that the ideas, to misquote Schwarz, are adapted to the time and place. Is this, perhaps, an early manifestation of the “canibalização” in Brazilian culture that Oswald de Andrade identified and advocated aesthetically almost four decades later?123 This is the question with which I would like to turn to the final text I will consider in this thesis, Adolfo Caminha’s Bom Crioulo.

---

123 Andrade characterised Brazilian culture as “cannibalistic” in its unabashed digestion of imported models, a process he encapsulated with the famous lines, “Tupi, or not tupi that is the question”. See Oswald de Andrade, “Manifesto Antropófago”, available at http://www.ufrgs.br/cdrom/oandrade/oandrade.pdf (accessed 21/03/16).
Chapter IV: Adolfo Caminha

Introduction

To consider, at the end of this thesis, Adolfo Caminha’s Bom Crioulo, with its similarities in plot to O Barão de Lavos, is not so much to return to where we began — the “scientific” portrayal of deviance clustered around a same-sex relationship — as to observe how the model travels and changes with great innovation across the Atlantic. In the previous chapter, I argued that Azevedo adapts the Naturalist model by introducing narrative currents that counter its fundamental principles, such as myth and allegory, and that these constitute an attempt to construct a Brazilian voice sensitive to the inadequacy of European thought in a supposedly independent Brazil. In Caminha’s Bom Crioulo, as the title playfully suggests and as I shall argue, such adaptations become no less than the structuring principle of the work. As we have seen, the author of A normalista and “Norte e Sul”, which criticises the accompanying words to Cruz e Sousa’s Missal, was deeply preoccupied with the reception and deployment of “scientific” thought in Brazil, apparently mistrusting its enthusiastic replication in national discourse, even if he sometimes reproduced its logic in his own criticism. Like Azevedo, Caminha grew up in the “underdeveloped” Nordeste, in neighbouring Ceará, and his admiration for the positivist ideas of the Escola do Recife, of which he was an “herdeiro intelectual”,¹ was bound up nevertheless with an awareness of their potential complicity in naturalising the economic and cultural power of metropolitan centres, particularly with regards to climate, which was central to the racial-social theories of the time. However, Caminha is altogether a more enigmatic figure than Azevedo, having published a relatively small body of work and dying of tuberculosis at the age of just twenty nine, a state of affairs compounded by the fact that A normalista, Bom Crioulo, his critical pieces, and his travel writings on the United States, No país dos Yankees, exhibit considerable differences in style.² Notwithstanding, the marginal position of Brazil is at play in all of these works, and Caminha engages closely with the dilemma of misplaced ideas. Drawing considerably on Abel Botelho’s O Barão de Lavos, then, and yet distorting the Naturalist narration such that the model is almost unrecognisable, Bom Crioulo serves, I hope, as an enlightening conclusion for my analysis of “Naturalism against nature” and its tumultuous journey around the Lusophone world.

² Bezerra argues on these grounds that Caminha is a polygraph, at ease in a range of literary registers, including journalism.

By turning, moreover, to Bom Crioulo in light of the texts considered thus far, I hope to bring an intertextual perspective that sheds new light on what is perhaps one of the most puzzling works of Brazilian literature, having divided critics considerably to this day. Published amid great scandal in 1895, this “audácia do século XIX”, about the relationship between a runaway black slave and fifteen-year-old white deckhand, has been successively scorned, censored, almost forgotten, “rediscovered” in the closing years of the twentieth century, and today finally holds a place in the Brazilian literary canon, “if not quite at its centre”, and is one of the most widely read novels from the Naturalist movement in Brazil. Surpassed perhaps only by O Cortiço in this respect, it is now generally considered Caminha’s finest novel, although critical consensus apparently extends little further. Soon after the novel’s publication, Valentim Magalhães described it as a “romance-pus, romance-poia, romance-vômito”, only two days after Alves de Faria wrote in true fin-de-siècle spirit that “apanha bem certas cenas e apesar [...] de descrever atos indecentes, reais, mas repulsivos, não desagrada ao leitor”, leaving readers wondering whether the book appealed to him despite, or because of these “indecent” scenes. After the great stir that the novel initially caused, however, Bom Crioulo “lapsed into obscurity” in the twentieth century; still in 1950, Lúcia Miguel Pereira wrote that novel contained “certas cenas repulsivas”, and the text’s unusual explicitness appears to have left critics unwilling to engage with it seriously. This reluctance changed markedly later in the century, when the American LGBT movement “discovered” the novel and hailed it as “a founding text of Brazilian gay literature”, sentiments typified in the 1980s English translation by Gay Sunshine Press with the somewhat less subtle title of The Black Man and the Cabin Boy, which Cristiano Mazzei has since criticised for “outing” the original text to attract a gay readership.

---

3 Editor’s note to Adolfo Caminha, Bom Crioulo (Lisboa: Sistema Solar, 2014). All page references are to this edition.

6 Cited by Howes, p. 43.

7 Ibid., p. 45.

in the United States, softening the language of degeneration theory in relation to same-sex desire and reinforcing the element of the exotic. More recently, however, César Braga-Pinto has drawn attention to the importance of degeneration theory in Bom Crioulo, reading the novel against Cesare Lombroso’s “science” of criminal man and cautioning against analyses that overlook the pathological treatment of race, violence and homosexuality. It is curious indeed that a novel that describes the pleasures of the central relationship as “contra a natureza”, reproducing all the “stereotypes, prejudices and misinformation of the time”, has led to a number of readings that appear to celebrate its “surprisingly modern approach towards issues of race, nationality, gender and sexuality”. By bringing intertextuality into play, taking my cue from the novel’s title and Elizabeth Ginway’s insight that Bom Crioulo is a “cultural hybrid”, I hope to disentangle these contrasting readings and propose a different framework for understanding the text, whereby its principle concern is not “homosexuality”, still less gay rights, but lies rather in “creolising” and renegotiating degeneration theory to imagine a “viable” future for Brazil in an age of cultural and economic dependency.

Bom Crioulo tells the story of Amaro, an escaped slave born in Brazil, who works as a sailor on an old merchant ship. In the years following his escape, he proves to be an exemplary worker, acquiring the nickname of “Bom Crioulo” from his colleagues — who admire his figure of an “homem robusto” — and submitting himself, without complaint, “à vontade superior” (pp. 26-7). The only sign of his propensity for destructive behaviour, which becomes increasingly clear over the course of the novel, is his habit of, “de longe em longe... se chafurdar em bebedeiras que o obrigavam a toda sorte de loucuras” (p. 26). At the beginning of the story, however, he falls passionately in love with Aleixo, a young, blond teenager of pale skin and effeminate figure. Their budding relationship, which begins happily, leads them to rent an apartment in a garret on the Rua da Misericórdia, Rio de Janeiro, owned by a corpulent Portuguese lady named Carola Bunda. Carola is supposedly an old friend of Amaro, grateful towards him for having saved her life in the past. However, after a year of perfect love and “gozo espiritual” (p. 69), Amaro is forced to work on a different ship, larger and more modern, which he is forbidden from leaving and where he is punished brutally for the slightest infraction of the rules. One day he flees the vessel, but drinks excessively in the city until landing himself in a fight with a Portuguese provocateur, after which he is arrested, returned to the ship and whipped mercilessly as punishment, requiring his convalescence in hospital. As such, Aleixo and Amaro spend months apart, leaving the latter increasingly jealous and imagining that Aleixo is with another man. Aleixo, however, is seduced by Carola Bunda herself, who thus betrays her old “friend” without remorse, intercepting and destroying the desperate letter he writes to Aleixo in hospital. The intergenerational love triangle, portending imminent disaster, thus clearly echoes that of O Barão de Lavos, though with some important differences that I will return to later. Eventually, Amaro escapes from captivity in hospital and returns to the Rua da Misericórdia, where he learns definitively of his betrayal by his friend and lover from a local baker. Enraged, he murders Aleixo in broad daylight and the closing lines, in another nod to Lavos, depict him being carried away by policemen.

11 Howes, p. 45.

13 Howes, p. 41.

Despite what seems to be an invitation to identify with Amaro, surely the “hero” of the story, and his plight, the language used in the novel reveals a more complex picture. As I have indicated, the narrator describes the sexual acts of the “pederasta” — as Amaro is frequently described — as “contra a natureza”, reproducing theories of sexuality being developed at the time by figures such as Krafft-Ebing, and which aimed to establish “homosexuality” (a term that, as we know, the movement itself invented) as a pathological abnormality. Even if such language is less pointed and diffuse in Bom Crioulo than it is in Lavos, it arguably casts a wider pathological net with its close interaction with race, alcoholism and criminality, categories which, as we saw in the case of Lavos, readily overlapped. Braga-Pinto’s study is particularly adept at demonstrating how the protagonist presents a constellation of “symptoms” that mark him as a “pathological” being, going as far to affirm that the novel is a “case study” of degeneration theory and in particular of Lombroso’s criminal anthropology. It is in this spirit, certainly, that the narrator describes Amaro as a “sistema de músculos” and “morbidez patológica” (p. 21). It seems pertinent, too, to consider Robert Howes’ claim that the central relationship, being necessarily non-generative, allows the author to avoid contemplating miscegenation as a form of integrating the freed slave into the new republic. In this sense, the appearance — surprising, perhaps — of a homosexual relationship in fact serves to reinforce strict distinctions of race. Challenging the sexual orthodoxy for its own sake does not seem to have been Caminha’s intention, and in the marginalising language

---

15 Howes, p. 41.

17 Braga-Pinto, p. 151.

18 Howes, p. 56.
deployed in relation to race and sexuality, we can hear the echo, even if dampened, of O Barão de Lavos.

However, whilst the discourse of degeneration and criminality can explain much of the characterisation in Bom Crioulo, particularly with regards to Amaro, leaving a sizeable linguistic footprint, there are also clear signs that the author contemplates its tenets at a critical distance. Besides the twisting and intertwining of cultural loans in the novel’s composition, which I will be exploring over the course of this chapter, I would like to mention two observations by critics that present a challenge to Braga-Pinto’s claim that the novel is a “case study” of degeneration theory. Firstly, Howes points astutely to the character of Herculano, an onanist with the unfortunate nickname of “Pingas”, scandalously caught in the act at the beginning of the novel, but who, at the end, appears:

> outro, admiravelmente outro, o Herculano — gordo, rosado, o olhar vivo e brilhante, sem melancolia, nem sombra alguma de tristeza. Perdera a antiga palidez que lhe dava um arzinho pulha de coisa à toa, falava desempenado, alto, e ria, como uma criança, por ninharias.” (p. 136).

Instead of “degenerating”, as theories of sexuality would dictate, the onanist seems entirely rejuvenated. Howes interprets this detail as a rejection, on the part of the author, of some of the more extreme strands of degeneration theory. However, the description of Herculano’s health is particularly emphatic, making use of asyndeton to heighten the sense of admiration, as well as words opposed in meaning to those typically associated with degeneration theory (“rosado”, “vivo”, “brilhante”). There is surely irony in Herculano’s plump, ruddy appearance, the image of a healthy, well-fed man, when set against the dark prophesies of degeneration theory. Might this episode not constitute, on the contrary, a jibe on the part of the author at the theories that he nonetheless reproduces elsewhere which, to use Santiago’s phrase, comes to surprise the original model? Caminha allows himself to play with the imported model, demonstrating, above all, a degree of critical distance that Braga-Pinto’s reading, attentive to the similarities with the work of Lombroso, risks not recognising.

This independence of thought is alluded to in the analysis of another critic, this time by Celina Moreira de Mello, who uncovers “uma discrepância entre o que autor pensa de 19 This is the conclusion of Howes, for example, who argues that Lavos is “controlled by the tenets of degeneration theory” to a much greater degree than Bom Crioulo. See Howes, p. 52.

20 Howes, p. 52.

seu romance e o romance que de fato ele escreveu". Although, in the article that he wrote in defence of Bom Crioulo after the torrent of criticism that followed its publication, Caminha describes his protagonist as “um degenerado nato” with “tendências homossexuais”, he does not make use of this term at any point in his novel. Mello perhaps exaggerates when she argues that this conspicuous lexical absence suggests the author believed “que amar uma pessoa do mesmo sexo não era um crime, mas um destino”, but it is nonetheless significant that Caminha seems not to have trusted this pseudoscientific term with which he was evidently familiar. Despite the word not being widely known or used at the time, the author still recognised it as one of the most authoritative and acceptable when the novel was criticised by prudish readers. Indeed, the criticism that surrounded the publication of Bom Crioulo warrants comment in itself, especially since it was marked by a series of speculations about the author’s own sexuality. Unfortunately, still recently, some critics have continued the speculation, reproducing the Foucauldian notion of the “will to know”, in which sexuality figures as a mysterious realm hiding inaccessible truths, and which Anna Klobucka has identified as a recurring tendency within Lusophone studies. In any case, it seems reasonable to suggest that such speculation would not have been welcome on the part of the author, and that he availed himself of “scientific” language in an attempt to attenuate its influence. It is curious, in this context, that the word “homossexual” does not appear in Bom Crioulo, suggesting a restriction of pseudoscientific thought in the narrative.

Correspondingly, the scandal that the novel provoked, far greater than than the relative feather-ruffling caused by the publication of Botelho’s unapologetically “pathological” work, O Barão de Lavos, suggests that Caminha’s narrative deeply offended bourgeois sensibilities in a way that Botelho’s did not, and continued to do so well into the 1950s when Lúcia Miguel Pereira contemplated the novel. The scandal illustrates too the restrictions that contemporaneous discourses imposed on authors; several novels were censored or restricted at the time for lewd and homoerotic content, and the space between the generally

---

23 Cited by Mello, p. 154 (my italics).

24 Ibid., p. 154-5.

25 Howes, p. 43.

26 See Foucault, The History…

accepted “pathological” genre, and writing that resulted in censorship, scandal and attacks on the author appears to have been constrictively small. Nevertheless, one can deduce that Caminha pondered considerably over the theories that he read before reproducing them, and that he was quite willing to adapt and play with them, doubtless more than Botelho was, and despite considerable risk to his reputation.

The creolisation of degenerescence

In light of this apparent critical distance on the part of the author facing the pseudoscientific discourses of degeneration theory, I now wish to explore the ways in which he distorts their principles. As I shall argue, the imbrication and creolisation of other models that work against positivist theories, which I claimed to be an important feature of Azevedo’s work, forms part of a process whereby the author appropriates European cultural influences, evaluating them and adapting them to his country. Several critics have commented upon the emergence of other literary styles in the the novel, in particular the gothic; Leonardo Mendes identifies the role this latter plays in shrouding sexuality with an air of mystery, as reflected in the description of the old corveta as “um grande morcego apocalíptico de asas abertas sobre o mar” (p. 15), or of the attic on the Rua da Misericórdia, in which the previous occupant dies of yellow fever, left abandoned during Amaro’s absence to gather cobwebs and mildew. However, like Azevedo in Casa de Pensão, Caminha also borrows from Romanticism, including an (anti-)foundational love triangle reminiscent of Alencar’s Iracema, to which I will return later. Christian mythology also plays a significant role in this respect. One night, when Amaro is unable to sleep on the ship’s deck, he gazes at the stars, imagining them “cantando o hino triunfal da ressurreição” (p. 34), suggesting a new beginning in his life. Later, when the corveta heads towards its destination in Rio, he wishes for the journey never to end in order to remain forever with Aleixo, in a wonderfully poetic sentence:

desejaria que a viagem se prolongasse indefinidamente, que a corveta não chegasse nunca mais, que o mar se alargasse de repente submergindo ilhas e continentes numa cheia tremenda, e a velha nau, só ela, como uma coisa fantástica sobrevivesse ao cataclismo, ela somente, grandiosa e indestrutível ficasse flutuando, flutuando por toda a eternidade. (p. 41, my italics)

There are clearly utopian resonances in the eternal journey of the corveta, audible in the calm repetition of the word “flutuando”, and in the appearance of the vessel, “grandiosa e indestrutível”, dreamed in the subjunctive. The metaphor of the flood also recalls the myth of Noah’s Ark, in which the world undergoes a moral purge that ends, importantly, in another new beginning. Like the “hino da ressurreição”, this image harmonises with the foundational love triangle akin to those of Brazilian Romanticism, and underscores the way in which Bom Crioulo presents itself not just as a text written at the beginning of a new era in the nation’s history, but as a confluence of discourses that participates actively in the national renegotiation.

---

30 See Foster, p. 15, for a discussion of Bom Crioulo’s utopian spaces.

Having drawn attention to the plurality of styles that Bom Crioulo synthesises, which is in many respects anticipated by Azevedo’s writing, I would now finally like to turn to the ways in which these interact. I shall begin with a literary model that has already been widely commented upon by critics, and one that echoes Eça’s and Azevedo’s use of tragedy (albeit Greek) in their novels, that of Shakespeare’s Othello. As Daniel Rhinow demonstrates, Othello was a remarkably popular play in fin-de-siècle Brazil, fascinating authors and audiences alike with what critics of the time, drawing links between race and violence, described as the “paixões ocultas e selvagens” of the hero. Braga-Pinto argues that the reference to Shakespeare, in this context, serves to reinforce the “degeneracy” of the protagonist. Such a view, however, assumes that Caminha himself shared this popular take on the Moor of Venice. For this reader, and although parallels between the impassioned Othello and the crioulo assassin of Rio are easily drawn, there is a decisive difference between the play and the novel. In Othello, Iago exploits the protagonist’s hamartia: his jealousy. There is no indication that Desdemona has been unfaithful, any insinuation of adultery proving to be conspiracy on the part of Iago, including the fateful handkerchief planted in Cassio’s quarters. In Bom Crioulo, however, suspicions of treachery prove to be correct, implicating betrayal as a factor — alongside his heritage — leading to the murder at the end.

When Amaro escapes slavery and begins paid work for the first time, he believes in a future of freedom and contentment, “sonhando histórias de viagem” (p. 33), and even carving small wooden ships in his excitement prior to embarking on his maiden voyage. Indeed, when he embarks for the first time,

Parecia-lhe ouvir ainda na proa do transporte, como as últimas reminiscências de um sonho, a voz dos companheiros abraçando-o:
— Adeus, ó Bom Crioulo: sê feliz! (p. 34)

---

31 Including, for example, Machado de Assis, in the famous plot line of Dom Casmurro (Lisboa: Guerra e Paz, 2016).

32 Rhinow, cited by Braga-Pinto, pp. 167-9, and Ginway, pp. 47-8.
The voices of his companions, vague and perhaps dreamed, wish him a life of happiness, "abraçando-o" in a show of brotherhood reminiscent of Benedict Anderson’s concept of “horizontal camaraderie” and “fraternity”, with which the nation creates an imagined community to which each individual supposedly belongs, a discourse we saw disrupted in the novels of Eça. In the same vein, Amaro is led to believe that Carola Bunda is a friend who does not judge by appearances:

[Carola] não se importava de cor e tão-pouco se importava com a classe ou profissão do sujeito. Marinheiro, soldado, embarcadiço, caixeiro de venda, tudo era a mesmíssima coisa: o tratamento que lhe fosse possível dar a um inquilino, dava-o do mesmo modo os outros. (p. 64)

The pretence of egalitarian treatment evidently echoes the liberal constitution of Brazil that had just supplanted the imperial regime. There is already a suggestion of irony here in the paradoxical use of the superlative in the word “mesmíssima”. Amaro, indeed, is systematically betrayed by these supposedly liberal ideals. In the first instance, after being transferred to another vessel, he quickly learns that life on a ship from which he is forbidden from leaving differs little from his prior enslavement. “Escravo na fazenda, escravo a bordo, escravo em toda parte… E chamava-se a isso servir a pátria!” (p. 60), he comments, in stark contrast to his optimistic departure at the beginning of the novel. Furthermore, the fact that Amaro is effectively enslaved on the second ship creates the conditions for the amorous betrayals of Aleixo and Carola, excluding the “slave” from the love triangle that develops. Carola proves particularly cruel and calculating, seducing Aleixo in full knowledge of her friend’s love for him, acting to prevent any communication between them, destroying Amaro’s love letter, and dissuading Aleixo from visiting him in hospital. Despite her miniature liberal manifesto, she describes the impassioned letter as “coisas de negro”, remarking that “negro é raça do diabo” e “quem o conhecer que o compre” (pp. 128-131), apparently advocating slavery. All the promises of community and happiness that once motivated Amaro’s commitment to the national project reveal themselves, at this stage, to be false and deceitful.

Ginway describes the love triangle as “exactly the same” as that of Othello, with Amaro the Othello, Carola the Iago, and Aleixo the innocent Desdemona. It is difficult, however, to claim that Aleixo is “innocent” when he derides Amaro for his low social position, contemplating the possibility of finding a man of greater influence, and even imagining that he is “sacrificando a saúde, o corpo, a mocidade… ora, não valia a pena!” (p. 80). Indeed, in contrast to Desdemona, Aleixo turns out to confirm, rather than demystify, all of the hero’s suspicions.

This “betrayal” of Shakespeare by Caminha in his reproduction of Othello surely has the effect of encouraging sympathy for the protagonist; perhaps it is this that has led to readings that view the novel as “an eloquent defence of Amaro”,\textsuperscript{35} or even of gay rights. It seems beyond doubt, at least, that the author invites the reader to look not just to the hereditary factors, but also to the circumstantial ones — a series of betrayals — implicated in the novel’s violent conclusion. Indeed, only after his first punishment as a “free” man does Amaro begin to change the good behaviour that earns him his nickname, treating his superiors “com desdém” and “maldizendo-os na ausência” (p. 39). Rather than linking this apparent sympathy for Amaro to a defence of his sexual practices, however, I propose reading this adaptation of \textit{Othello} as, above all, an attempt to emphasise the importance of the environment in governing the destiny of individual and nation.

---

34 Ginway, p. 47-8.

In the previous chapter, I mentioned that theories of degeneracy typically hinged on questions of heredity and environment, with little overall consensus on which was most influential in the course of the individual’s life. Those that drew on Darwin tended to stress the importance of heredity (since it was this that determined one’s suitability for the environment),\textsuperscript{36} whilst those that drew on Lamarck and Spencer, whose ideas remained popular in Brazil even after the landmark publication of \textit{The Origin of Species}, argued that the environment had the potential to alter hereditary characteristics.\textsuperscript{37} In Brazil, Sílvio Romero found himself at the crossroads of these differing perspectives, at first seeking national “salvation” in the \textit{branqueamento} hypothesis (which sought to “improve” the nation’s “stock”) and gradually turning towards the Lamarckian view; Marshall Eakin identifies a definitive change in his thought after 1888,\textsuperscript{38} when he emphasises the “transformative power of social forces”, and even before this, the education of the populace to achieve what he called “\textit{a conquista da inteligência sobre o fatalismo da natureza}”.\textsuperscript{39} Of course, such thinking is fraught with contradictions, but Romero’s late interest in the power of environment meant that it was widely and seriously considered by Brazilian intellectuals of the time as a way out of disastrous predictions for the nation’s future, these seemingly inevitable conclusions of European thought. We have seen already how Azevedo, for example, becomes ever more interested in the environment in his works, shifting the narrative focus from the mulatto to the \textit{cortiço} over the course of his literary career and, already in \textit{O Mulato}, handing ultimate victory to Maranhão itself. In \textit{Bom Crioulo}, the power of the environment is made explicit; it seems no coincidence, for example, that pederasty and masturbation take place aboard a ship devoid of women. When it comes to the author’s reworking of Shakespeare, then, and the reader is encouraged to look at the transformative impact of the protagonist’s circumstances in his violent crime at the end, it seems that this latter is presented in the novel as the principle means of working — to quote from Bom Crioulo itself — “contra a natureza”.

\textsuperscript{35} Foster, p. 20.

\textsuperscript{37} See, for example, Derek Freeman et. al., “The Evolutionary Theories of Charles Darwin and Herbert Spencer”, \textit{Current Anthropology}, Vol. 15, No. 3 (September 1974), pp. 211-37 (pp. 214-5).

With the relationships in Bom Crioulo essentially barren, as we have seen, Caminha circumvents the miscegenation hypothesis and presents the environment as the principle agent capable of fighting “against nature”. Perhaps these two structuring forces, apparently opposed to each other, go some way to explaining the much-commented “contradictions” in the narrative, which Mello describes as “uma ambiguidade tão feroz que quase destrói o romance”.

In this sense, although the protagonist is apparently presented as a “born degenerate”, we are also invited to contemplate, with the distorted reference to Shakespeare’s Othello, whether or not the murder would have occurred, had not the murderer been betrayed so completely. Seen in this light, the possibility of identification with Amaro, which is also to share his suspicions of Desdemona’s betrayal, becomes part of a process in which the supposed inevitabilities of heritage, disastrous for the nation’s future, are covertly refuted.

I mentioned earlier that one of the effects of “creolising” the Naturalist discourse, typified by the (ab)use of Shakespearean tragedy, consists of forging a way out of a wider, national “degeneration”. The word “crioulo” of the novel’s title and eponymous protagonist refers, in the context of nineteenth-century Brazil, to a person of African descent born in Brazil and, in a more general sense in the colonial age, to a descendent of Europeans, born and brought up overseas.

Its meaning, therefore, traverses opposing notions of nature and environment including, importantly, education. To allow the environment to work “against nature”, as happens (or more precisely, does not happen) in Bom Crioulo, is also to allow something inherited to develop under the influence of the surrounding biological and cultural environment. Caminha conceives this “creolising” process at several levels of literary composition. The protagonist is compelled to attempt a reconciliation of his inherited characteristics with the environment in which he finds himself. On a more allegorical level, meanwhile, the new republic must contemplate and accommodate (if abysmally) the freed slave that it has inherited. Finally, the novel itself “inherits” Naturalism and degeneration theory as a structuring discourse and appropriates it, twisting it, modifying it, creolising it, indeed, to account for a different socio-political context. In this space in between European Naturalism and Caminha’s novel, the ground is cleared for a renegotiation of degeneration theory that can forge a “viable” future nation.

---

40 Mello, p. 153.

Bom Crioulo as (anti-)foundational novel

If, therefore, we can model the literary and even ideological structure of Bom Crioulo as a creolisation of discourses, one that seeks to adapt and adjust these to the socio-political context, I would now like to illustrate and strengthen this reading by considering the central love triangle as “foundational” of the nation, and which can again be compared productively with that of Iracema, José de Alencar’s “fantasy of American-European miscegenation” that I discussed in the previous chapter. I previously drew attention to Bom Crioulo’s foundational tactics in Caminha’s use of Christian mythology, and the novel’s love triangle bears clear similarities, if also interesting differences, to Alencar’s foundational text. In fact, the markedly divergent figuration of the love triangle in Bom Crioulo when compared with Iracema is reminiscent of the sterile inversion encountered in Casa de Pensão, so much so that this latter work might be taken as a further literary influence, alongside O Barão de Lavos.

In Casa de Pensão, as I argued, Madame Brizard appears as an ideological inversion of Iracema: overweight, European, old and sterile. Carola differs little from Madame Brizard in character; she also runs a guesthouse, is Portuguese, overweight, middle-aged, seductive, calculating, selfish and childless. Caminha — characteristically perhaps — was evidently not concerned with disguising any debt to Azevedo, but Carola also warrants comparison with the bourgeois, if ultimately adulterous, Elvira in O Barão de Lavos, from whom she represents a significant departure. Indeed, whilst Elvira is seduced by Eugénio in Lavos, Carola becomes a powerful temptress in Bom Crioulo, reversing the dynamic of seduction. Treating Aleixo as “filho” seven times in the novel, she is a Brizard-like anti-mother, incorporating Lusophobia, identified by Nelson Vieira as a growing sentiment in nineteenth-century Brazil, into the contemporaneous, misogynistic representation of woman that readily dichotomised into angel or temptress. In this respect, her nickname “Bunda” is every bit as intriguing as Amaro’s: asides from attributing to her a dangerous sexuality, it is possible, in accordance with his use of the word “crioulo”, that Caminha was alluding to the word “bundo”, derived from “kimbundu”, popularly used to refer to any black African language and, by racist extension, “linguagem incorreta”. Thus whilst the bom crioulo — ostensibly the outsider — fights for a place in society, Carola Bunda, the exploitative Portuguese lady who ought to speak the language as a native, is subtly marked as the outsider herself, with wordplay that renegotiates notions of belonging in a post-independence Brazil.

See http://www.priberam.pt/dlpo/bundo (accessed 05/05/16).
Besides the Lusophobic inversion of the mother figure, a further discrepancy arises with Iracema, and also with Casa de Pensão and Lavos: the incorporation of the “freed” (or escaped) black slave into what Howes describes as “one of the first [Brazilian novels] to have a pureblooded black as its hero”.45 Iracema, by contrast, is a particularly conspicuous candidate for what Roberto Schwarz describes as “as ideias fora do lugar”, and Schwarz himself devotes a whole essay to the “contradictions” in the work of Alencar, although he is careful to describe these as illuminative strengths rather than literary weaknesses.46 Thus in Iracema, the total absence of slaves is at odds with a nation sustained by a slave economy, and the European, in the form of Martim, is virtuous and generative despite the reality of continued exploitation; these contradictions illustrate the necessarily precarious position of Brazilian intellectuals of the time, who could neither abandon European ideas nor implement them convincingly in their country. In Bom Crioulo, however, Caminha launches a reactive attempt to reassemble the love triangle of Iracema, and indeed Casa de Pensão, with parts better representative of the new Brazilian nation: Aleixo, the working-class, white Brazilian, Carola, the Portuguese capitalist, and Amaro, the freed black slave.

It might seem that, even if Bom Crioulo strives for a more appropriate representation of society, the same deadlock is reached as in Casa de Pensão, characterised by childlessness and an apparent refutation, on the allegorical plane, of a national future, this overshadowed by a monstrous European mother and the absolute exclusion of the slave. As Ginway suggests, Bom Crioulo depicts a “cultural impasse” in nineteenth-century Brazil.47 Indeed, the inherited demographics do not in themselves point to any possible route towards progress. However, and as perhaps anticipated in Casa de Pensão, Caminha’s dialogue with other novels is so extensive that, returning to the creolisation hypothesis, another kind of fecundity is subtly restored at the level of the text. Caminha appropriates the “pederastic” relationship of Lavos, the intergenerational seduction of Casa de Pensão, and in an inverted sense, the foundational allegories of Iracema and the Brazilian Romantics, fusing them with the story of Othello. These models are then adapted to account for the exploits of slavery and colonialism in Brazil, both of which apparently foreclose any generative future. And by placing these issues centre-stage, rather than behind the curtain, as in Iracema, the author once more draws readers’ attention to the contemporaneous environment and its role in reinforcing the troubling cultural impasse, necessitating a novel, creolised discourse and a new basis for national belonging. Once more, it is in the environment, and not race and heredity, that we find the way forward, with ideas that are adapted to the place, and not the place to the ideas. If Iracema depicts national generation, and Casa de Pensão sterility, Bom Crioulo restores the former not by depicting it but by performing it in creole. The result is a shift in focus from the “viability” of the inherited demographics to the viability of the very symbolic universe in which these are represented and understood.

---

45 Howes, p. 42.

47 Ginway, p. 45.

The dialogue with *O Barão de Lavos

Caminha’s interaction with other literary texts is thus quite extraordinary, constituting an aesthetic and ideological position in itself, reminiscent of Oswald de Andrade’s Manifesto Antropófago, in which Brazilian cultural production is characterised principally by its “cannibalisation” of European trends, famously exemplified in the witty phrase, “Tupi, or not tupi that is the question”. Bom Crioulo performs a similar distortion and interweaving of European models — including, of course, Shakespeare — to that found in Andrade’s own manifesto. As I have indicated elsewhere, I am not the first to have drawn attention to Caminha’s literary and cultural debts, and others, I have little doubt, will discover further examples in the novel. I would venture that Camões’ Os Lusíadas, as well as contemporaneous journalism, particularly surrounding the naval revolt of 1893, present interesting avenues for future research. However, for the purposes of this study, I would now like to return to O Barão de Lavos as a key literary precedent for Caminha’s “creole” novel.

The correspondences between Lavos and Bom Crioulo are difficult to pass over: an intergenerational love triangle, a pederastic relationship enacted in a hideaway city apartment, the subsequent betrayal of the hero by the woman and his teenage lover, the demise of the hero, and his final handover to the police at the end. So too are the love triangles deployed to represent, allegorically speaking, differing elements of Portuguese and Brazilian society. If the economy of the western world could be said, until the abolition of slavery in Brazil at least, to have consisted of four main classes — the aristocracy, the bourgeoisie or capitalist class, the proletariat, and slaves — Lavos deals primarily with the first three, and Bom Crioulo with the latter three. That only the capitalist classes and the proletariat are dealt with by both novels reflects the gradual erosion of 48 Indeed, as I have indicated elsewhere, the “whitening solution”, refuted or at least circumvented in Bom Crioulo, is the example par excellence of the adaptation of the place to the ideas.

50 There has, indeed, already been work in this direction: Bezerra, in his study (p. 384) discusses the appearance of ship Luís de Camões in the novel, which I will return to shortly, and more broadly discusses Caminha’s interest in journalism. Howes mentions Caminha’s protests at naval punishments as a young cadet as a possible influence (see Howes, p. 45), whilst Mendes (p. 216) points to the Naval Revolts of 1881-4 that saw the government bombarded by the navy for remaining in power unconstitutionally.
the aristocracy and slavery over the course of the century, the former primarily in Europe, and the latter in the New World, though this should of course be conceived as one process rather than two separate ones.\textsuperscript{51} Despite their similarities, therefore, compelling differences can be established between the two novels that help us to organise them within the literary and socio-economic space of the Lusophone world and beyond.

My analysis of \textit{Lavos} focused closely on its narrative structure whereby, I argued, the so-called “pathological” approach leads to a representation that is both reductive and productive, surprisingly generative in its obsession with degeneracy. Central to this process is the irresolvable dialectical movement between the voice of the doctor-narrator and that of the Baron in free indirect discourse which, despite its remarkably transgressive perspective, becomes a justification, more often than not, for the doctor’s diagnosis. I compared this state of affairs to Bakhtin’s concept of the monological narrative, in which characters exist purely to confirm the views of the narrator,\textsuperscript{52} if also to conclude that at times, the narrative creates surprising spaces for other subjectivities.

There are evidently traces of this logic in \textit{Bom Crioulo}; the thoughts of the characters are typically related in free indirect discourse and often work against the nature of the narration. For example, when Amaro contemplates relinquishing any hope of seeing Aleixo again, he says to himself, “Abandoná-lo, porque? Porque era negro, porque fora escravo? Tão bom era ele como o imperador!…” (p. 135). His fervent conviction that his blood is no inferior to that of the emperor himself contrasts clearly with that of the narrator, who describes Amaro as a “morbidez patológica”. Amaro’s words are indeed strikingly reminiscent of those of the Baron of Lavos when he learns that he is not the only pederast in Lisbon: “— E porque não?… Que fizera ele de condenável, no fim de contas?…”, a remark that the narrator dismisses immediately as a “vibração da insânia”.\textsuperscript{53} In \textit{Bom Crioulo} and \textit{Lavos}, then, if in different measure, free indirect discourse both challenges and confirms the views of the narrator over the course of his tale.

However, the narrator of \textit{Bom Crioulo} is much less consistent in his descriptions of the protagonist. Although, in \textit{Lavos}, the doctor-narrator insists upon characterising the Baron’s relations with Eugénio as “abonimações”, “andromania” and “neuropatia”, in \textit{Bom Crioulo}, the narrator uses other words to describe love that echo those that the protagonist himself uses in free indirect discourse. Aleixo, for example, at the beginning of the relationship, is described with “a \textsuperscript{51} Thus the greatest supporters of abolition in Brazil were the middle classes, who promoted liberal ideals largely as a means to diminish the influence of the slave-owning classes associated with the monarchy. To them, freed slaves presented a new potential workforce that could consolidate their growing power. See, for example, David Brookshaw, \textit{Race and Colour in Brazilian Literature} (London: The Scarecrow Press, 1986), pp. 41-49.

alma na perpétua alegria dos que não têm cuidados” (p. 70), suggesting the blissful happiness of first love. In the paradise of their room on the top floor — hidden far away from the street, unlike the Baron of Lavos’ cell — the pair is described as an ideal couple:

Ficavam em ceroulas, ele e o negro, espojavam-se à vontade na velha cama de lona, muito fresca pelo calor, a garrafa de aguardente ali perto, sozinhos numa independência absoluta, rindo e conversando à larga sem que ninguém os fosse perturbar — volta na chave por via de dúvidas… (p. 71).

The details of the narration, such as the old bed which, far from reflecting the “degeneracies” of the couple, is found “muito fresca pelo calor”, create a utopian space safeguarded by the locked door, resisting, like the onanist Herculano, the discourse of pathology. The diminutive “sozinhos”, meanwhile, suggests affection on the part of the narrator, apparently absent in some of the more overtly Naturalist passages. In the same vein, in the honeymoon phase of their relationship, the narrator describes the three main characters as “como uma pequena família, não tinham segredos entre si, estimavam-se mutuamente” (p. 73), language manifestly at odds with the terminology of “contra a natureza”, and indeed decidedly inclusive in its invocation of normative kinship to describe the “queer” love triangle. Once again, the word “pequena” is suggestive of affection; there is even a childlike simplicity in the phrasing, with main clauses subordinated between commas, quite at odds with the precise, clinical style of a narrator-doctor. In O Barão de Lavos, by contrast, the narrator describes the love triangle of Sebastião as “a desamparada ruína do seu nome”, the undoing, rather than the tentative formation of a family. Here the shift in the representation of relationality across the Atlantic comes into particular relief. Although the doctor of Lavos, outside free indirect discourse, is incapable of regarding Sebastião’s pederastic relationship as anything other than a corruption of heterosexual love, Caminha, from time to time, allows antiscientific language to disperse through the narrator’s discourse, weakening definitively the cordon sanitaire that separates the protagonist’s “degenerations” from the bourgeois reader. Like creole languages, the narration plays with the imported model to create a version in which old distinctions are lost and new connections are made. Indeed, whilst Lavos depicts the end of an old aristocratic family, excluded from society by the new science of the bourgeoisie and so comforting the bourgeois reader, Caminha makes space for the new citizen, the freed slave fighting for social 54 Aleixo, indeed, although attracted to the basic financial security that Amaro can offer him, shows far more enthusiasm in the relationship than Eugénio does in Lavos, whose interest in the Baron is purely financial. During Amaro’s absence, for example, he is unable to forget him, thinking often of his “musculatura rija” and “natureza extraordinária” (p. 112). By raising the degree of reciprocity in this manner, Caminha renders it subtly more legitimate, since it does not rest solely upon financial interest as in Lavos and indeed the relations in Casa de Pensão.

---

55 Botelho, p. 312.
recognition in the wake of abolition. It is by adapting the original model in this manner that the reader can hear that which Lopes-Júnior describes as “uma subjectividade outra”. What certain critics, therefore, have interpreted as contradictions in the novel that almost lead to its destruction can, on the contrary, be read as a space of highly productive betrayals that seek a novel, generative discourse capable of incorporating new voices.

The dialogue with O Barão de Lavos concludes at the end of Bom Crioulo when, in another transparent reference to Botelho’s text, police arrive at the scene of Aleixo’s murder. Here, the altered representation of the ending confirms Caminha’s willingness to establish a plurality of voices heard in a language other than that of degeneration theory. In Lavos, I argued, the closing lines create a seamless transition between the perspective of the narrator and that of the policemen examining the Baron’s body, in a resounding victory for the bourgeoisie and its “sciences” of degeneracy. In Bom Crioulo, the narrative focuses instead on the process of examination itself:

Muitas vistas dirigiam-se para o sobradinho.

Aleixo passava nos braços de dois marinheiros, levado como um fardo, o corpo mole, a cabeça pendida para trás, roxo, os olhos imóveis, a boca entreaberta. O azul-escuro da camisa e a calça branca tinha grande chumaço de panos. Os braços caíam-lhe, sem vida, inertos, bambos, numa frouxidão de membros mutilados.

A rua enchia-se de gente pelas janelas, pelas portas, pelas calçadas. Era uma curiosidade tumultuosa e flagrante a saltar dos olhos, um desejo irresistível de ver, uma irresistível atração, uma ânsia!

Ninguém se importava com o outro, com o negro, que lá ia, rua abaixo, triste e desolado, entre as baionetas, à luz quente da manhã: todos, porém, queriam ver o cadáver, analisar o ferimento, meter o nariz na chaga...

Mas um carro rodou, todo lúgubre, todo fechado, e a onda dos curiosos foi se espalhando, se espalhando, até cair tudo na monotonia habitual, no eterno vaivém. (pp. 152-3)

The pathological perspective is seen in the second paragraph, with words such as “inertes” and “membros mutilados” reducing Aleixo to a sum of physical parts. However, this perspective is not made consistent with that of the narrator, as in Lavos, but rather with the multitude that rushes to observe the blood and gore, with a perverse, “desejo irresistível de ver, uma irresistible atração, uma ânsia!”. This uncontrollable urge is thus articulated in the same —pathological? — terms as

57 Mello, p. 153.
Amaro’s own attraction to Aleixo, with remarkably similar syntax: a “vontade irresistivelmente dominada pelo desejo de unir-se ao marujo, como se ele fora de outro sexo, de possuí-lo, [...] de gozá-lo!...” (p. 42). As with the figure of Nini in Casa de Pensão, what ought to be the “perverse” object of pathological study — the hysteric, the murder of Aleixo — readily reveals, on the contrary, the perversion of the study itself. In a similar vein, whilst the policemen are the saviours of the bourgeoisie at the end of Lavos, here they are barely noticed as they lead Amaro away between bayonets: “ninguém se importava com o outro”. His story of betrayal thus dissolves into the perverse observation of his crime by the people, and his return to captivity in the hands of a burgeoning criminal justice system. Only the narrator seems to grasp society’s woeful indifference to “o outro, o negro” as the usual monotony returns, Amaro’s plight lost in the “eterno vaivém”, in what can again be interpreted as a rejection of the Hegelian view of historical progress through ideological synthesis, seen too in the novel’s deployment of tragedy. The clear distancing of the narrator’s perspective from that of Lavos and degeneration theory at the end, tapering into the poetic language of “a onda de curiosos [...] se espalhando, se espalhando”, once again demonstrates Caminha’s attempt to rework imported discourses in a way that gives voice to the repressed.

To bring together the claims about Bom Crioulo that I have made in this chapter, I would like to discuss one particular passage from the novel that efficiently illustrates Caminha’s creolisation of imported styles to represent a different social reality. These are the three paragraphs detailing the violent punishment that Amaro receives after his fight with the Portuguese provocateur:

E, como da outra vez, Bom Crioulo emudeceu profundamente sob os golpes da chibata. Apanhou calado, retorcendo-se a cada golpe na dor imensa que o cortava d’alto a baixo, como se todo ele fosse uma grande chaga aberta, viva e cruenta..... Morria-lhe na garganta um grunhido estertoroso e imperceptível, cheio de angústia, comprimido e seco; dilatavam-se-lhe os músculos da face em contrações galvânicas; o sangue, convulsionado, rugia dentro, nas artérias, no coração, no ímpeto da sua natureza física, palpitante, caudaloso, numa pletora descomunal!

Ele sofria tudo com aquele orgulho selvagem de animal ferido, que se não pode vingar porque está preso, e que morre sem um gemido, com o olhar aceso em cólera impotente!

Errava na luz intensa do meio-dia uma tristeza vaga e universal. Lá de fora, da barra, vinha, encrespando a água, um arzinho fresco impregnado de maresia. A cidade, em anfiteatro, cintilava entre montanhas na lânguida apatia daquela hora calmosa. O vulto do couraçado, largo e imóvel no meio da baía, com o seu enorme ariete, com a sua cobertura de lona, resplandecia destacado, longe dos outros navios, longe de terra, fantástico, arquitetural! (pp. 105-6).
This passage is particularly noteworthy for its seamless fusion of literary styles. On the one hand, Amaro’s convulsions, choleras and “contrações galvânicas” could be drawn from a contemporary medical textbook and seem to establish a pathological perspective. However, the style becomes increasingly poetic over the course of the episode, with “scientific” phenomena giving way to more evocative images. The second paragraph metaphorises the punishment, comparing Amaro to an injured animal: still the language of Naturalism, but without the pathological edge of degeneration theory. Finally, when the narration moves to a panoramic description in the last paragraph, the reader is presented with an image of modernity — the city and the enormous new battleship — but dressed with curiously Romantic language. The vessel sits motionless in the idyllic Guanabara bay, surrounded by “um arzinho fresco”. Even the city, ever the fascination of the Naturalists, does not grow and rot as an organism beneath the detailed vision of Zola, but shimmers between the mountains in the midday sun. Meanwhile, Caminha develops a peculiar sense of rhythm over the course of the passage. The short clauses describing his physical symptoms create a certain tension, a sense of breathlessness reproduced in subsequent paragraphs, all of which end in exclamation marks. In the final sentence, too, the repetition of “com” and “longe” works to build the rhythmic tension. Indeed, the distinct rhythm of the passage, reaching its climatic moments in the repeated exclamation marks, evokes the atmosphere of a chant, a spell, or even an epic poem. Why would Caminha juxtapose the language of pathology with the rhythm and style of an incantation? The two discourses are clearly opposed on the ideological field. It is as though the searing pain of Amaro’s punishment demands an urgency and intensity of expression that the detached Naturalist perspective cannot deliver. As in Azevedo’s O Mulato, the inclusion of narrative currents that violate Naturalist principles points towards their inadequacies in representing the (post-)colonial world, and in this case, significantly, in relation to flagellation, one of the most enduring and traumatic images of slavery. By creolising the Naturalist discourse in this manner, Caminha forges a different system of representation for his country, one that presented the Naturalist writer with a markedly different object of study to those of Zola or Eça de Queirós. The word crioulo derives from Latin “creare” (to create): surprisingly generative resonances, perhaps, for a novel described by critics as a “case study” of degeneration theory, and in which no one bears children. It is this generative potential of creolisation, however, that the author of Bom Crioulo exploits particularly astutely, blending the Naturalist discourse with other, apparently contradictory styles to accompany the process by which the freed slave, born in, brought to... never indigenous to Brazil, fights for a place in the new republic. By appropriating Naturalism and adjusting it to account for different social realities, Caminha both restricts and reworks degeneration theory, allowing environment to work against nature, and thus echoing the later work of Sílvio Romero in seeking to weaken the pessimistic implications of degeneration theory in Brazil. At the same time, he includes a “pederastic” relationship that has the effect of bypassing the other “way out” of national “degeneration”, the miscegenation hypothesis. It is this relationship, perhaps, together with the sympathy we are invited to feel for the protagonist, that has led some to argue that the novel functions, above all, as an apology for gay rights. On the contrary, I propose that Caminha is much more interested in salvaging the nation from the stigma of degeneration theory than he is the homosexual. Similarly, I hope to have demonstrated how the supposed narrative “contradictions” in Bom Crioulo can be read not as tortuous inconsistencies by an author who hovered indecisively above a library of European texts, but rather as betrayals of imported models, productive, creative and seeking to adapt ideas to the place. Indeed, if we follow the creolisation hypothesis, it is possible to synthesise a range of critical observations that may seem contradictory at first sight.

Perhaps the true “queer” dimension of Bom Crioulo, therefore, is not the central pederastic relationship but the rejection of any faithful adhesion to hegemonic discourses of the time, which also suggests an author highly critical of what he read and equally conscious of the fate of Brazilian intellectuals obliged to use inadequate representative models born of Europe. My decision to begin and end with Lavos and Bom Crioulo was of course strategic: viewed against each other, their formal differences become especially apparent. One could certainly argue that, in this particular journey across the Atlantic, degeneration theory is turned on its head, such that the representation of “deviance” in Lavos translates, in Bom Crioulo, to deviance in representation. As I mentioned earlier, the crisis moves from one of individual and national bloodline to the very symbolic order in which notions of bloodline, belonging and relationality are articulated. In this sense, Bom Crioulo anticipates what Karl Posso finds in the novels of Silviano Santiago and Caio Fernando Abreu, where he identifies an “indecidibilidade” in the discourse as a strategy for challenging “os termos relacionais pelos quais a sociedade ortodoxa, heteressexista, funciona”59 disturbing the imposed linearity and binary conflicts of heteronormative society. In a similar vein, reading the “queer” in Bom Crioulo as, above all, a problematisation of representation itself, leads us to its most radical aspect, which is surely its willingness to challenge not so much sexual norms per se as the nexus of discourses that sustained the balance of power in Western World, looked upon from its cultural and economic periphery. As such, it is unfortunate, for this reader, that Bom Crioulo has not received the same recognition in the Brazilian canon as Iracema. For however much the Brazilian Naturalists’ sympathy for the slaves’ cause can be explained their supposed allegiances to free-market capitalism, it seems undeniable that Caminha transcended the dictates of his social class, troubling the language with which power was wrought in the nineteenth century, including, especially, that of Naturalism and degeneration theory, which were the choice aesthetic systems for the "modernising" middle classes. In this respect, this enigmatic author from Ceará, who proved remarkably brave in his determination to write "against nature", was truly visionary.

Concluding remarks

This thesis has taken us on a journey beginning with an obscure work of social pathology from fin-de-siècle Portugal, moving to the centre of the Portuguese canon to consider the novels of Eça de Queirós, and then over the Atlantic to Brazil, where Naturalism never quite reached the same canonical status, even if it did enjoy immense popularity and engaged extensively with the movement in Portugal and France. Naturalism and its positivist sister discourses have evidently served as my formal basis for comparison. However, the treacherous interplay and diversity of the works considered suggests that under close scrutiny, the essence of the discourse, in the Lusophone world at least, is as slippery as its objects of “scientific” study, its authors forming an uneasy kinship. Thus Bom Crioulo, as I have argued, retells O Barão de Lavos and other stories in a concertedly different idiom, limiting considerably the presumed supremacy of “science”. But our journey from Lavos to Bom Crioulo returns us to the rather different question that I posed in the introduction. What if to be a Naturalist writer in Portuguese was, in practice, to write against Naturalism? To refashion it, undo it from within, and turn it on its head?

Certainly, Eça, Azevedo and Caminha dare to dwell upon the insufficiency of the discourses that they nevertheless deploy. Even Abel Botelho, who could be considered the most “faithful” to the movement, generates the same symbolic excess that he strives to isolate and remove, using allegory, for example, to develop a particularly Portuguese “pathology”. Allegories of nationhood, interestingly, are common to all of the texts, apparently at odds with the Realist-Naturalist “reality effect” identified by Roland Barthes. Criticism of Naturalism has often focused on its supposed “failures” on its own “scientific” terms, stemming from the fundamental contradiction in its structuring principle which, in the introduction, I set in the context of mankind’s troubled relationship with the “natural” world, of which we are observers but never an integral part. Thus Naturalism tended to repress the subjective aspect of narration and produce the supposedly “natural” reality that it claimed only to describe and analyse. Meanwhile in Portugal and especially Brazil, with notable exceptions to which I have referred, the movement was judged further against Zola’s own model, set up to “fail” twice over. However, I hope to have shown how departures from Zola’s model, in Lusophone Naturalism at least, often seek to deal with the very contradiction of his formula since, as countries on the economic and cultural periphery variously imagined as “degenerate”, Portugal and Brazil experienced the positivists’ attempted transformation of culture into nature particularly keenly. This is one of my claims. My second is that if Lusophone Naturalism is, in other words, a series of “queer” reiterations of other Naturalist models, it consistently challenges structures of power by reimagining relations of kinship. These claims are indeed two sides of one coin, insofar as the exploration of race, gender, bloodline, sexual desire and the incest taboo, themselves so central to power in the western world, necessarily pressures the language that naturalises their reality, consciously or otherwise.

To illustrate these claims we can return to that passing remark by António Cândido that I cited elsewhere in this thesis and would now like to address from a different perspective. Pointing to the widespread incidence of non-normative desire in Lusophone Naturalism, Cândido argues that its authors oversaw a “degradação do enfoque naturalista”, such that “as coisas de sexo” came to be seen in a scandalous, and therefore antinaturalist, manner. “É como se nas sociedades mais atrasadas… o provincianismo tornasse difícil adotar o Naturalismo com naturalidade”.1 Here, as António Carlos Santos has argued, Cândido produces the “unnaturalness” that he sets out to identify, reading non-normative desire as a symptom of misplaced ideas rather than an integral part of their renegotiation.2 It remains a useful claim, however, because it nevertheless points to an implicit link between discourse and kinship that I have been addressing throughout this thesis. Changing the logic slightly, we could argue instead that the difficulty in adopting Naturalism as “natural” in these countries in turn spurred attempts to adapt it, leading to a renegotiation of the naturalising language in which ideas of kinship and relationality were articulated, ideas that Cândido himself unwittingly deploys, and that worked to construct the “degenerate” periphery of Naturalist discourse. Thus, for example, allegorically sterile anti-mothers, such as Carola and Madame Brizard, or the spectre of a “queer” Dom Sebastião, pressure the Naturalist model and the “natural” family in the same move to critique the supposedly progressive changes of the nineteenth century as experienced in Portugal and Brazil. The same could be said of Eça’s exploration of the ambiguity in the terminology of kinship, or of Azevedo’s use of the Oedipus myth, or of Caminha’s creolisation of Naturalism to work against the influence of heritage and bloodline. To refashion the bonds of kinship is, in some sense, to write against naturalising representations in general, because it gestures towards an alternative, imagined pattern of social organisation, or at least pressures the established one as “natural”.

How this process of renegotiation plays out in each author’s work tells us much about their countries and positioning within their societies, literary canons and markets. Thus Eça and Botelho both reimagine the family in their depictions of a country in economic decline in relation to its northern neighbours, an old imperial power entering the new industrial, capitalist order of the period with some difficulty. The disruption to the patriarchal family also testifies to social upheavals in class and gender dynamics and to an emerging concept of a deviant “homosexuality” that had been showcased in various scandals in fin-de-siècle Portugal. Similarly, the allegorical appearance of Dom Sebastião, common to the work of both authors, demonstrates the extent to which this mysterious monarch continued to exert a pull on the Portuguese imaginary centuries after his disappearance, imputing transhistorical meaning into individual “pathologies” to distort what is otherwise presented as the study of “reality”. The references to Greek desire, beauty and tragedy similarly pressure the Naturalist representation of human experience. But whereas in Lavos, non-normative kinship is principally the malady of the aristocracy, used to strengthen the bourgeois sphere from which it is (almost) sealed, comforting an overwhelmingly bourgeois readership, Eça associates normative kinship with a crisis of nation, knowledge and representation, deconstructing its terms, and calling for a comprehensive reassessment of relationality. As such, his vision was many times keener than that of Botelho, and his place in the canon is surely justified, even though the work of both authors reflects the same ideological context in compelling ways.

Further differences emerge, however, when we compare these works to those from Brazil. Here, there is a still greater willingness to alter the Naturalist model formally, introducing other epistemological currents that work against its influence, from Romanticism and the gothic to epic poetry and myth — not to mention tragedy, an innovation common to both sides of the Atlantic, though arguably first developed by Azevedo in Brazil. Again, these adaptations lead us to the distinct national context, one in which the intellectual culture was imported and “inauthentic”, and which, prior to adaptation at least, was always out of place in a slave economy. Above all, however, the Brazilian texts are more concerned with imagining a “viable” national future, which can be understood in the context a tenuous First Republic that was supposedly racially disadvantaged, deemed by some to be insurmountably so, and which was still shackled to European colonialism and the consequences of slavery. This participation in the building of a new nation, which stands in contrast to the Portuguese texts that dwell on a past of “mistakes” and a future of death and oblivion — or at best eternal moonlight — is consistent with the general trend of literary production in nineteenth-century Latin America, which often sought a basis for national progress and belonging. And as misplaced ideas par excellence, Naturalism and degeneration theory required considerable adaptation if they could ever gesture towards a generative future for Brazil.

There are other conclusions to be drawn from the interaction of the Portuguese and Brazilian texts that relate to the countries’ close, if troubled history before and after Brazilian independence, which saw the same royal family continue to govern on the pretext of maintaining close relations. One, which is hardly new, is the widespread presence of Lusophobia in fin-de-siècle Brazil, doubtless part of the same nationalist turn that characterises Latin American literature from the period, and reflective of the manner in which colonial practices continued to endure. Of particular interest here, however, is the way in which the Portuguese pretence to good kinship, as demonstrated in their desire to maintain the pan-continental monarchy, is reflected back in Brazilian Naturalism as its monstrous inversion, indeed the very inviability of kinship, in the form of a sterile mother. As Francisco de Magalhães asked of Luso-Brazilian relations in 1880, approaching the issue in identical terms, “que diabo de trapalhada de parentesco é esta?” And thus much as Portugal itself struggled to find a place in the new world order, the representation of the Portuguese in these works makes it clear that it continued to exert exploitative power and remained closer to centres of dominance than Brazil. This insight is consistent with Boaventura de Sousa Santos’ claim that Portuguese identity in the nineteenth century was “semiperipheral”, characterised by being both marginal to the Western World and centre of its own diminishing one.4

A somewhat less orthodox conclusion in this direction relates to the degree to which Brazilian and Portuguese Naturalists altered and refined each others’ works to create a tentative transatlantic movement that wrote against Naturalism in mutually productive ways. On the one hand, the Brazilians drew heavily on Naturalist works from Portugal, often shifting their focus to explore social concerns peculiar to their country. Thus A Normalista and O Mulato, for example, retell O Crime do Padre Amaro and O Primo Basílio so as to draw attention to the culture of misplaced ideas and slavery. But on the other hand, as I have argued, these same authors exerted a degree of influence in Portugal, at least as regards Eça de Queirós, who seems to have refined his tale of incest in Os Maias after reading O Mulato. Both works draw on the myth of Oedipus to explore the incest taboo, exposing the hypocrisy of the replacement of slavery with liberal, free-market capitalism, though as with Lavos and Bom Crioulo, the former sees this replacement chiefly in relation to the demise of the Portuguese aristocracy, and the latter in terms of the open wounds of slavery in Brazil. In this respect, despite the differing positions of Portugal and Brazil in the western world at the time, we can perhaps speak of “Lusophone Naturalism” as, at its high points at least, a transatlantic circulation of ideas that sought to adapt and subversively reiterate pseudoscientific discourses of the nineteenth century in countries that, in different measures, suffered the ascendency of a global bourgeoisie.

It is therefore little surprise that the writers in question often used similar techniques to rework Naturalism in their countries. Allegory is undoubtedly one of these, despite Cândido’s assertion that it is not used by Eça.5 After all, it is a particularly effective vehicle for moving from the representation of kinship and degeneracy to one of nationhood — and back again, often corruptively. But perhaps the most intriguing adaptation to appear consistently in Caminha, Azevedo and Eça, from the perspective of Naturalism’s internal contradiction at least, is the recourse to the ancient tradition of tragedy. Whether Othello or Oedipus Rex, the existential threat to Naturalist principles is clear: how can humanity be understood in terms of logical, scientific laws, if subject to the whims of the gods or, perhaps worse still, chaos and disorder? By the same token, in these works, the Hegelian notion of social progress is refuted by the suggestion that the traumas of the past — slavery, abandonment and exploitation — will always return to overshadow attempts to ignore them.⁶ Ironically, then, in Portugal as in Brazil, tragedy returns from the distant past to sabotage precisely what Zola’s Naturalism seeks to repress: the unpredictability, ambiguity and especially, in these cases, plurality of human experience. In this sense, Eça and the Geração de ’70, who bemoaned their failure to transform their country, were not the only vencidos da vida; the phrase could, with relative ease, be extended to characterise Azevedo and Caminha, tragedy being perhaps its most lucid manifestation in their novels. But even if they acknowledged defeat, in writing against Naturalism, which was also to write against normative conceptions of kinship and the human, these writers displayed remarkable insight into how the representation of culture as nature — one side of a binary problem that troubles the world no less today than it did then — formed an integral part of perpetuating power structures in the Western World.

---

5 Cândido, p. 114.

Naturalism was perhaps the last literary movement to draw so significantly on positivist principles before modernism shook the epistemological foundations of Western thought, and its critical regard has rarely reached the heights of that which it enjoyed in the fin de siècle. Eça de Queirós is a notable exception in this respect, and it is hoped this study has revealed yet more ways in which his work continues to surprise, fascinate and amuse. Few, if any, picked apart the ideology of the nineteenth-century world more thoroughly than he. As for the remainder of the movement in Portugal and Brazil, there are doubtless ways in which it, too, can be reconsidered. As Furst and Skrine suggest, “Naturalism succeeded best where it appeared to fail”.⁷ Indeed, perhaps the Lusophone Naturalists, in writing against their masters and against nature, redeem the movement itself by complementing Zola’s model. One could even suggest that, all the more for being Naturalists on the margins, they understood the inseparability of discourse and power; their movement established, surely if sometimes tentatively, a highly critical idiom. These are questions still to be explored and developed; I have little doubt that the wealth of Naturalist literature in Portuguese, of which I have considered only a selection, will shed new light on them. As the age of the Anthropocene is declared, and the conflict between “nature” and “culture” seems far from resolution, the need to hear the voices of those that have lived and challenged this conflict is a no less important task.

---

⁶ Here I am thus extending the conclusions of Maria Manuel Lisboa, who discusses the use of tragedy to disrupt Naturalist thought in Eça, to the movement as a whole. See Maria Manuel Lisboa, “Uma Caixa de Charutos, uma Caixa de Fósforos ou como o Mundo Acaba”, in Teu Amor Fez de Mim um Lago Triste: Ensaíos Sobre Os Maias (Lisboa Campo das Letras, 2000), pp. 333-93.

Bibliography

Primary Texts

AZEVEDO, Aluísio, Casa de Pensão (Rio de Janeiro: Ediouro, 1980)

———, O cortiço (São Paulo, Editora Ática, 2005)

———, O homem (Rio de Janeiro: Livraria Garnier, 1923)

———, O Mulato (São Paulo: Klick Editora, 1999)

———, Philomena Borges (Rio de Janeiro: F. Briguet & Cia., 1952)

BOTELHO, Abel, O Barão de Lavos (Porto: Lello, 1982)

———, O livro de Alda (Porto: Lello, 1984)

CAMINHA, Adolfo, Bom Crioulo (Lisboa: Sistema Solar, 2014)

———, A normalista (Rio de Janeiro: Ática, 1998)

———, “Norte e Sul”, in Cartas Literárias, edited by Italo Gurgel (Fortaleza: UFC Edições, 1999), pp. 107-112
QUEIRÓS, José Maria de Eça de, "O brasileiro", in Obras de Eça de Queirós, 15 vols. (Porto: Lello, 1948), vol. 15, pp. 397-402

———, A cidade e as serras (Lisboa: Biblioteca Editores, 2009)

———, Contos (Lisboa: Bertrand Editora, 2008)

———, Correspondência (Lisboa: Caminho, 2008)

———, A correspondência de Fradique Mendes (Lisboa: Livros do Brasil, 2002)

———, O crime do Padre Amaro (Lisboa: Editora Livros do Brasil, 2013)

———, Ecos de Paris, in Obras de Eça de Queirós, vol. 9, pp. 189-389

———, "O francesismo", in Obras de Eça de Queirós, vol. 11, pp. 333-57

———, A ilustre casa de Ramires (Porto: Porto Editora, 2006)

———, O mandarim (São Paulo, Z edições, 2013)

———, “A marinha e as colónias”, in Obras de Eça de Queirós, vol. 15, pp. 125-37

———, Os Maias (Porto: Porto Editora, 2006)

———, O primo Basílio, intro. by Maria Tarracha Ferreira (Lisbon: Ulisseia, 2002)

———, A reliquia (Porto: Porto Editora, 2006)

———, A tragédia da Rua das Flores (Lisboa: Fernando Pereira, 1980)
Other fictional works

MACHADO DE ASSIS, Joaquim, Dom Casmurro (Lisboa: Guerra e Paz, 2016)

SOPHOCLES, Oedipus the King, translated by David Grene in Sophocles I: Antigone, Oedipus the King and Oedipus at Colonus, edited by Mark Griffith and Glenn W. Most (London: Chicago University Press, 2013), pp. 71-143

Critical works

AGUIAR, de Freitas, and Claval, Paul, “Seasonality in Brazil”, in Seasonal Landscapes, edited by Hannes Palang et. al. (Dordrecht: Springer, 2007), pp. 61-85

AYDEMIR, Murat, Indiscretions: At the Intersection of Queer and Postcolonial Theory (Harleem: Colophon, 2011)

BALFOUR, Arthur, Decadence (Cambridge: CUP, 1908)

BENSLAMA, Fethi, Psychoanalysis and the Challenge of Islam, translated by Robert Bononno (Minneapolis: Minnesota UP, 2009)

———, Portugal de Eça de Queiroz (Lisboa: Imprensa Nacional Casa da Moeda, 1986)

CARVALHO, Maria de, “Eça de Queirós e a ópera no século XIX em Portugal”, in Revista Colóquio/Letras, May 1986, pp. 27-37

COLEMAN, Alexander, Eça de Queirós and European Realism (New York: NYU Press, 1980)

DE MAN, Paul, Blindness and Insight: Essays in the Rhetoric of Contemporary Criticism (Abingdon: Routledge, 1983)

“Signature Event Context”, in Limited Inc (Evanston, IL, 1997), pp. 1-25

EL FAHL, Alanda, “José Matias: Um Amor Fora de Lugar”, in Fôlio — Revista de Letras, v. 6, n. 2, pp. 11-23

EL FAR, Alessandra, Páginas de Sensação (São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 2004)

———, Totem and Taboo, translated by Abraham A. Brill (New York: Cosimo Classics, 2009)

Frier, David, “Transcender o passado ou perder-se no passado? À procura de comunidades imaginadas n’A ilustre casa de Ramires e n’A cidade e as serras”, Queirosiana, 21-22 (2010-11), pp. 57-73

HIGGS, David in Queer Sites: Gay Urban Histories Since 1600, edited by David Higgs (London: Routledge, 2002), pp. 128-32

HOWES, Robert, “Concerning the Eccentricities of the Marquis of Valada: Politics, Culture and Homosexuality in Fin-de-Siècle Portugal”, Sexualities, Vol. 5 (I), pp. 25-48

IRIGARAY, Luce, This Sex Which is Not One, translated by Catherine Porter and Catherine Burke (New York: Ithaca, 1985)

JÚNIOR, António Salgado, História das Conferências do Casino (Lisboa: Cooperativa Militar, 1930)

———, “Border Crossings: Transnationalism and Sexuality in Gombrowicz’s Trans-Atlantyk and Eça de Queirós’s A Cidade e as Serras” (paper presented at the conference Intra Muros, Ante Portas: Iberian and Slavonic Cultures in Contact and Comparison, Universidade de Lisboa, May 2008)

LEMOS, Antero Vieira de, Eça de Queiroz, o seu drama e a sua obra (Porto: Edição do Autor, 1945)

———, Teu amor fez de mim um lago triste: ensaios sobre Os Maias (Campo das Letras, 2000)

LOMBROSO, Cesare, Criminal Man [1876], translated and with introduction by Mary Gibson and Nicole Hahn Rafter (London: Duke University Press, 2006) with introduction by Roberto Reis (Tempe, AZ: Center for Latin American Studies, Arizona State University, 1991), pp. 67-75

MACHADO, Álvaro Manuel, A Geração de ’70: uma revolução cultural e literária (Lisboa: Instituto de Cultura e Língua Portuguesa, 1986)

MAGALHÃES, Valentim, Escritores e Escritos (Rio de Janeiro: Camiliano, 1889)

MARTINS, António Coimbra, Ensaios Queirosianos (Lisbon: Publicações Europa-America, 1967)

MARTINS, Oliveira, Elementos de Antropologia (Lisboa: Guimarães Editora, 1954)

MÓNICA, Maria Filomena, Eça de Queirós (Braga: Quetzal, 2001)

MONTEIRO, Joaquim Gomes, Vencidos da vida: Relance literário e política da segunda metade do século XIX (Lisboa: Edição Romano Tôrres, 1944)

MONTELLO, Josué, Aluísio Azevedo e a polêmica d’O Mulato (Rio de Janeiro: José Olympia, 1975)

MOOG, Clodomir, Eça de Queirós e o século XIX (São Paulo: Delta, 1966)

PLATO, Symposium, translated by Benjamin Jowett (Rockville, Maryland: Serenity Publishers, 2009)

POSSO, Karl, Artimanhas de sedução: homossexualidade e exílio (Belo Horizonte: UFMG Press, 2009)

QUENTAL, Antero de, “Causas da decadência dos povos peninsulares nos últimos três séculos” (lecture delivered at the Casino de Lisboa, 22nd March 1871, available at http://www.arqnet.pt/portal/discursos/maio01.html [accessed 05/05/17])

REIS, Carlos, História da literatura portuguesa: O realismo e o naturalismo (Lisboa: Publicações Alfa, 2001)

———, Estatuto e Perspectivas do Narrador na Ficção de Eça de Queirós (Coimbra: Livraria Almedina, 1984)

ROMERO, Silvio, Cantos populares do Brasil (São Paulo: José Olympio, 1954)

ROTHWELL, Phillip, A Canon of Empty Fathers (Cranbury, NJ: Rosemont, 2007)

SARAIVA, António José, As Ideias de Eça de Queirós (Lisboa: Gradiva, 2000)

SCHWARZ, Roberto, “As ideias fora do lugar”, in Ao vencedor as batatas (São Paulo: Editora 34, 2000), pp. 11-31

———, “A importação do romance e as suas contradições em Alencar”, in Ao Vencedor as Batatas (São Paulo: Editora 34, 2000), pp. 33-82

———, “Nacional por subtração”, in Que horas são? Ensaios (São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1987), pp. 29-48

SERRÃO, Joaquim Veríssimo, História de Portugal (Lisboa: Verbo, 1978)

SILVEIRA, Fabiano, Da criminalização do racismo: aspectos jurídicos e sociocriminológicos (Belo Horizonte: Editora Del Rey, 2007)

SIMÕES, João Gaspar, Vida e Obra de Eça de Queirós (Lisboa: Livraria Bertrand, 1973)

SOUSA SANTOS, Boaventura de, “Entre Própero e Caliban: Colonialismo, Pós-colonialismo e Interidentidade”, Novos Estudos, No. 66 (July 2003), pp. 23-52

TARQUÍNIO DE SOUSA, Octávio de, A vida de D. Pedro I (Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1957)

VALÉRIO, Elisa, Para uma leitura de Os Maias (Lisboa: Presença, 1997)

VIEIRA, Nelson, Portugal e o Brasil — A Imagem Recíproca (O Mito e a Realidade na Expressão Literária) (Lisboa: Instituto de Cultura e Língua Portuguesa, 1991)

ZILBERMAN, Regina, “Eça entre os brasileiros de ontem e hoje”, in Eças e outros: diálogos com a ficção de Eça de Queirós (Porto Alegre: EDIPUCRS, 2002), pp. 7-21

Archives and collections

Diário de Notícias, 6th September 1888, Biblioteca Nacional de Portugal.

Diário do Governo, no. 177 (Lisboa, 20th July 1912), pp. 2714-5, Biblioteca Nacional de Portugal.

Diário Popular, 24th April 1886 — 5th August 1888, Biblioteca Nacional de Portugal.

Internet sources

<http://bumba-meboi.info/a-lenda.html>

<https://en.oxforddictionaries.com>

<http://lisboaverde.cm-lisboa.pt>

<http://www.arqnet.pt>

<http://www.dicionarioweb.com.br>

<http://www.etymonline.com>

<http://www.ornithos.com.br>

<http://www.priberam.pt>